The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Farrell, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, each with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 3936. An act to regulate the practice of the healing art to protect the public health in the District of Columbia; and

S. J. Res. 182. Joint resolution for the relief of farmers in the storm and flood stricken areas of southeastern United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12956) to amend certain sections of the teachers' salary act, approved June 4, 1924, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled bills and joint resolutions signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and transmitted to the Senate before the recess was taken yesterday.

OPEN-PRICE ASSOCIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting in response to Senate Resolution 28 (submitted by Mr. MCKELLAR in the Sixty-ninth Congress, special session of the Senate, agreed to March 17, 1925), a report on open-price trade associations prepared under the direction of the commission by its chief economist, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Assistant Secretary of Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of miscellaneous papers on the files of the Immigration Service, Bureau of Labor Statistics, United States Employment Service, Children's Bureau, and the Women's Bureau, which are no longer useful in the transaction of official business and have not sufficient historic interest to warrant preservation, and asking for action looking toward their disposition, which was referred to Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Vice President appointed Mr. COUZENS and Mr. COPELAND members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a communication from the secretary of the Federal Radio Commission, reporting, pursuant to law, that there is an accumulation of letters from radio listeners known as "fan mail," which are considered useless in the transaction of official business and have no permanent value or historic interest, and asking for action looking toward their disposition, which was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Vice President appointed Mr. WATSON and Mr. SMITH members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the State Senate of Nebraska, favoring the making of an appropriation for the construction and maintenance of a road beginning at a point near Decatur, Burt County, Nebr., thence running in a northwesterly direction to Macy, Thurston County, thence to the Winnebago Agency, and thence to the village of Winnebago, Thurston County, all situated within the limits of the Omaha and Winnebago Reservation, Nebr., which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. SALE OF COTTON AND GRAIN IN FUTURE MARKETS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to resubmit my unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. NORRIS. With the understanding that I shall not lose the floor, I yield to the Senator from Arkansas to submit his unanimous-consent request.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, there was a unanimous-consent agreement proposed yesterday afternoon, and at the request of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] it went over until this morning. Before I renew it I want to give notice of some mere verbal changes which I purpose to offer by way of amendments.

On page 1, line 8, after the word "communication," I want to strike out the words "from one" and insert in lieu thereof the words "by any firm in a"; in line 9, to strike out the words "any other" and insert in lieu thereof the words "a person in another"; and in line 11, to strike out the words "to any" and insert in lieu thereof the word "a," so as to make the paragraph read:

The word "message" shall mean any communication by telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, cable, or other means of communication by any firm in a State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to a person in another State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or a foreign country.

On page 2, line 20, after the word "delivered," strike out the word "or," before "received," and insert the word "and," so as to make the clause read "without intending that such cotton or grain shall be actually delivered and received."

On page 3, line 8, after the word "or," insert the word "by," so the clause will read "or by both such fine and imprisonment."

On page 3, in line 14, after the word "message," strike out the word "and" and insert the word "an," so the clause will read "furnish to the person transmitting such message an affidavit."

At the end of the bill, on page 7, add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 9. This act shall take effect 12 months after its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the amendments are agreed to en bloc. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CARAWAY. I now submit the unanimous-consent agreement which was sent to the desk on yesterday and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that, beginning at 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of February 13, 1929, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes on the bill S. 1093 or any amendment that may be pending thereto.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, there ought to be a quorum here before the agreement is entered into.

Mr. CURTIS. It does not require a quorum.

Mr. DILL. It does not require it, but it is in effect a closing of debate.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator wait to present his unanimous-consent agreement, if there is going to be a point of no quorum made?

Mr. DILL. I have no objection to the request, but I think it is very bad practice, because it is in effect closing debate, and I shall make the point of no quorum before it is agreed to.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well. I will present it a little later.

MR. EDISON'S VIEWS ON PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT, ETC.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, on day before yesterday there was celebrated the eighty-second birthday of Thomas A. Edison, one of the great men of the world. I send to the clerk's desk a part of a statement which he made while President-elect Hoover was his guest, and ask that the clerk may read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

He (Mr. Edison) said the increasing stock speculations will cause ultimate panic; that the $24,000,000 additional prohibition enforcement fund should be voted; that the Government should not go into the public-utility business; and that the United States should have a navy on a parity with Great Britain.

ELECTRIC LIGHT RATE IN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, several days ago in some remarks that I made in the Senate I drew a comparison between the electric light rates charged along the Canadian border by Canadian municipalities and American municipalities. I followed that a day or two later with a comparison of rates that are charged for electricity in the State of New York comparing the rates there by private companies with the rates charged by the municipal plant owned at Jamestown, N. Y. In the course of my remarks I inserted in the RECORD a table giving the top electric light rates charged by quite a large number of municipalities in the State of New York where they are supplied with electricity by private corporations. In that table there were three places where the rates were designated as flat rates. In that class was the city of Binghamton, N. Y. In the table it was stated that there was a flat rate in Binghamton of 15 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Shortly after that time I received a letter from the manager of the Chamber of Commerce of Binghamton, N. Y., calling my attention to the fact that the table had misquoted the rate charged in that city by the private corporation supplying electricity to the municipality. In the letter of the manager of the Chamber of Commerce of Binghamton there was inclosed a rate sheet showing the rates as charged by the private company. Upon examination of the rate sheet I discovered that it had not yet gone into effect and that the rates to be charged as shown on the rate sheet would not go into effect until March 7.

I answered the letter of the chamber of commerce telling them that I would be glad to correct any error if one had been made, but calling the attention of the representative of the chamber of commerce to the fact that the rate sheet which he inclosed was still ineffective. I called his attention also to the fact that the table which I had inserted in the RECORD and which contained the only reference I had made to Binghamton in my remarks had been taken, as I stated in my remarks at the time, from a magazine article printed in a magazine of November, 1928.

In his answer to that letter of mine he stated that while it was true that technically the rates had not yet gone into effect, yet, as a matter of fact, the rates, while not legally effective, had been put into effect and were in effect at the present time in Binghamton.

An examination of what I said in the Senate will reveal the fact, as I have stated, that I made no reference to Binghamton except that I put the table in the RECORD, and Binghamton was one of the towns included in the table. I stated at the time I did it that the table was taken from the magazine, Public Ownership, and that the date of the magazine wherein the table was included was November, 1928, and that the table was taken from an article in that magazine written by a Mr. Carlson, who was an ex-mayor of the city of Jamestown; so I gave exactly the source of my information.

At the same time I wrote the chamber of commerce I wrote Mr. Carlson and called his attention to the fact that the city of Binghamton through its chamber of commerce had challenged the rate and asked him what was the source of his information. Mr. Carlson said in his letter in reply in part as follows:

As to the letter of the manager of the Binghamton Chamber of Commerce alleging that the Binghamton rate had been misquoted in my article, I wish to say that my figures were obtained from the 1927 report of the bureau of municipal information at Albany, N. Y. It is not improbable that there was a misprint in the report or that a subsequent reduction has been made, as indicated by the manager of the Binghamton Chamber of Commerce.

In view of this fact I feel as you do that a statement should be made correcting the first report.

In this connection I wish to call attention to the fact that the city of Jamestown has also filed a proposed reduction in rates with the Public Service Commission of the State of New York on which action is now pending and to which the Niagara company are now protesting.

It will be remembered that the city of Jamestown owns its own electric plant and claims to have, as the table shows, the cheapest rate of any municipality in the State of New York. I continue reading from Mr. Carlson's letter:

I am inclosing herewith our proposed classification of reduction, and which, when effective, will, you will observe, give the people of the city of Jamestown, under its municipal plant, a rate which is more than 50 per cent less than the rate now promised by a private company to the people of the city of Binghamton.

Regretting that the discussion should have given the people of Binghamton any offense, and thanking you for your interest in the matter, I remain,

Very sincerely,

SAMUEL A. CARLSON.

I think that explains sufficiently how the error came about. There is no doubt in my mind that the table of rates from which Mr. Carlson quoted the Binghamton rate was in effect at the time he secured the information, but since that time there have been several reductions.

I am very glad, indeed, to correct the error that exists in the table put into the RECORD as to the rate charged in Binghamton. I think the writer of the article secured his information from a very reliable source, and at the time he secured it from that source undoubtedly the information was correct, but the rate has been reduced since.

The manager of the Binghamton Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Johnson, in his letter to me gives an example of what the existing rates would be in Binghamton. Their rates are rather complicated and they do not have the rates, as most cities do, commencing at a certain figure and grading down, but they have a rate made up of two items, an energy charge, which is charged for electricity consumed, and a service charge. This service charge varies with the size of the house. A 6-room house consuming a certain amount of electricity would have a certain bill to pay, but for the same amount of electricity consumed during the month a larger house would have a different bill to pay. To simplify the matter, the representative of the chamber of commerce has given an illustration of what the charges would be. He says in his letter:

The rate is made up of a demand charge based on the size of the home and an energy charge for kilowatt-hours used. For example, an average home might be considered as follows: Six rooms, hall, bath, porches, and cellar.

This constitutes a total of 10 demand units, or a total demand charge of $1.40.

That is, every month that charge would have to be paid, regardless of the amount of electricity consumed.

For various uses per month of energy bills are arrived at as follows.

Then he gives three examples of the charge for such a house. Remember, it is a house of six rooms; it has a hall in addition and a bath, porch, and cellar.

For monthly use—

He is computing now what it would cost if the owner of the house used and consumed in one month 20 kilowatt-hours—

Twenty kilowatt-hours at a maximum rate of 9 cents per kilowatt-hour, $1.80; average rate, 9 cents.

That seems to be the top rate. He gives an illustration of the charge for the same house if it should consume 50 kilowatts a month, as follows:

Demand charge, $1.40; 50 kilowatt-hours, at 4 cents, $2; total bill, $3.40; average, 6.8 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Then he gives another illustration of the charge for the same house, assuming that it consumed 200 kilowatt-hours, a very large amount for an ordinary house in places where electricity is not cheap.

For monthly use of 200 kilowatt-hours the items would be as follows:

Demand charge, $1.40; 100 kilowatt-hours, at 4 cents, $4; 100 kilowatt-hours, at 3 cents, $3; total bill, $8.40; average rate, 4.2 cents.

Taking the same house and assuming that it consumes 500 kilowatt-hours, the items would be as follows:

Demand charge, $1.40; 100 kilowatt-hours, at 4 cents, $4; 400 kilowatt-hours, at 3 cents, $12; average, 3.48 cents per kilowatt-hour; total bill for the month, $17.40.

Let me digress here to say that I presume in the city of Binghamton there are very few residents, indeed, perhaps not a single one, in a house of that size who consume 500 kilowatt-hours a month.

Taking the new rate that the municipal plant at Jamestown has applied for, and using for illustration the same house consuming the same amount of electricity, I have figured out what the same consumer would have to pay if his home were in Jamestown instead of in Binghamton. That comparison is exceedingly interesting, and I should like the people of Binghamton, if they are interested in this matter, to see just how much more they are paying for electricity from a privately owned plant there than is paid by the residents of the city of Jamestown, where the municipality owns the plant.

Take the first illustration given by Mr. Johnson, the manager of the Chamber of Commerce at Binghamton, of a house of six rooms which has in addition a hall, a bath, a porch, and a cellar. The average rate there is 9 cents and the total bill is $1.80. If the owner of that house had lived in Jamestown, where there is a municipally owned plant and the rates were in force for which they have applied, but which the Power Trust is trying to prevent them from obtaining, his bill would have been 80 cents instead of $1.80.

In the second illustration given by Mr. Johnson, who, I repeat, is the manager of the Chamber of Commerce at Binghamton, where the owner of a 6-room house uses 50 kilowatt-hours in a month, he has to pay under the new rate in Binghamton $3.40. If that little home were in Jamestown, and if the same amount of electricity should be used, the owner under the new rates there would have to pay but $2.

Let us take the next illustration, one where it is assumed that the owner consumes 200 kilowatt-hours in a month. In Binghamton, under the figures given by the chamber of commerce, the consumer had to pay $8.40, but if he had moved his house at the beginning of that month over to Jamestown, and had lived there, and had consumed the same amount of electricity from the municipal plant under their new rates, he would have had to pay $6.13 for his electricity.

Take the other illustration. In case the owner of this little house in Binghamton consumed 500 kilowatt-hours in a month, he would have to pay in Binghamton $17.40—I am taking the figures given by the Chamber of Commerce of Binghamton—but if he had lived in Jamestown, under their new rates, where the plant is operated by the municipality, he would only have had to pay $13.63; $17.40 in Binghamton, $13.63 in Jamestown.

So, while there was an error—and I am glad to correct it—at the same time, in making comparison on the true basis from the figures given by the chamber of commerce, we get the results that I have just given to the Senate.

While I am making comparisons for the State of New York, I might add another one. I have here an article written by Mr. James Malcolm, editor State Service, of Albany, N. Y., in which he compares the rates charged in the State of New York with the rates charged in Ontario, Canada, which is just across the line. That comparison is along the same line as the one I have heretofore given to the Senate, except I confined myself closely to the international boundary line, while he goes over the whole State. He inserts in his article a table that is exceedingly interesting. He says—and in this statement he tells where he got the table:

The public committee on power in New York State, a nonpartisan committee aiming to protect the interests of small consumers, recently prepared the following table comparing rates for domestic consumers in this State and in Ontario.

At this point, Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD without reading the table referred to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to call attention to some of the items in the table. First, however, let me tell the Senate about one of the columns in the table, Column IV. The table takes 21 cities in Ontario, and then a number of cities, 40 or 50, that compare in population with the various Ontario cities; it gives the rates in Ontario and computes what the rates would be in the State of New York. In order to meet an objection that is made, the gentleman who prepared the table added to the Ontario rates 1 cent a kilowatt-hour on account, as he says, of their not paying taxes. This is shown in Column IV. In Ontario the hydroelectric commission that generates and distributes the electricity to the municipalities does pay taxes. The municipalities, however, owning the distributing systems do not pay taxes. So it is not right to say that the system in Ontario pays no taxes, but the one who prepared this table adds for taxes 1 cent a kilowatt-hour to every rate that he gives for Canada. Every student of the subject knows that that is an excessive amount to add for taxes. Without having definite information, but from my general information on the subject, I should say that there is not in the State of New York a private corporation generating electricity that pays as taxes as much as 1 cent a kilowatt-hour on the amount it generates. As a rule, the taxes such a corporation pays will amount to from 2 to 3 to 4 mills a kilowatt-hour instead of 1 cent; but it will be noted, on examination of this table, that even after adding a cent for taxes, which, in my judgment, is three times as much as ought to be added, and in this case four times as much, because the Canadian system does pay some taxes, still the advantage is always in favor of the Canadian cities.

In the list of American cities with which the comparison is made is Binghamton. Since Binghamton is interested in what I have been saying about rates, I should like to call the attention of the people of that city to how they show up in the table. The rates in Binghamton are compared with those in London, Ontario, because the cities are nearly the same in size. The average monthly consumption for domestic service in the city of London, Ontario, is 116 kilowatt-hours. That is more than three times as much as the average consumption for domestic service in the United States.

As a matter of fact, taking the State of New York over, the average consumption of electricity for domestic service will be a little over 30 kilowatt-hours per month, while the average consumption in all the Province of Ontario, under its publicly owned system, is nearly 100 kilowatt-hours. In other words, the average consumption in Ontario, compared with the average consumption in the homes in the United States, is more than three times greater; and the consumption always goes up when the rates go down. The average consumption, as I have said, in London, Ontario, is 116 kilowatts a month, and the average bill for that electricity in the city of London is $1.77, which is considerably less than 2 cents a kilowatt-hour. There has been added to that for taxes 1 cent a kilowatt-hour, which makes the average bill $2.93, as shown in column 4. If a resident of Binghamton, N. Y., had consumed the same amount of electricity during the same month, his bill would have been $5.74—a difference in favor of the Ontario city of $2.81, and a difference in one year in the amount the customer would pay of $33.72.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I have figured it out without allowing the 1 cent for tax. It is perfectly unreasonable to allow 1 cent a kilowatt-hour for tax, especially when compared with the Canadian city, where at least some taxes are paid. I have made a computation, and I find that comparing the city of Binghamton with the city of London, over in Ontario, the average amount of electricity used in London in domestic service is 116 kilowatt-hours per month. The same amount of electricity in Binghamton would cost $5.74, as I have said; but if we omit adding 1 cent for taxes, the difference for that month in favor of the consumer in London, Canada, over the consumer in Binghamton is $3.97, practically $4 in one month; and in one year the consumer in Binghamton pays $47.64 more for his electricity than he would have paid if he had lived in London, Canada, and paid the rates there under the publicly owned system.

I now yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. That was the question I was going to ask the Senator—the difference between the price in New York and in Canada. He has already answered it.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let us take another one out of this table. Brantford, over in Canada, has a population of 28,000. Let us compare it with Mount Vernon-White Plains, N. Y. The average monthly consumption in Brantford, Canada, in domestic service, is 122 kilowatt-hours. The same amount of electricity over in Mount Vernon-White Plains would cost $12.34. In Ontario, at Brantford, it costs $3.06, even after adding 1 cent a kilowatt-hour for taxes. In one year the home-owner over in Mount Vernon, N. Y., would pay $111.36 more for 122 kilowatt-hours than he would have paid in Canada, even if 1 cent were added for every kilowatt-hour over in Canada.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I merely desire to correct what I think was an inadvertence in the Senator's answer to the question of the senior Senator from Alabama when he stated that the rates charged in New York and in Canada in all instances had that disparity. Let me ask the Senator if it is not a fact that that disparity does not exist between the rates charged by plants owned and operated by a municipality in the State of New York and the rate charged by the publicly owned plants in Canada?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not made any comparison of that kind, but without making it I will say just in a general way that I think the Canadian rate would be lower even than the municipally owned rate, for instance, at Jamestown, for the reason that in Ontario, Canada, they have what is called a superpower system, and by organizing a superpower system and supplying a whole territory or a whole State with electricity it can be generated and sold cheaper than if every municipality had its own generating plant. In the city of Jamestown, in the Senator's State, with which I have been comparing some of these rates, the electricity is made from coal, and, as the Senator knows, the competing company in Jamestown gets its electricity from Niagara Falls; and yet this competing company supplies its customers outside of the limits of the municipality, so this article said that I read the other day, at nearly twice what it charges within the city limits. So, although this privately owned company is getting cheap power from Niagara Falls, and is competing with a municipal plant that must generate its electricity from coal and that must ship its coal in from the coal fields, the privately owned company is objecting right now before the Public Service Commission of New York to the application of the municipality to reduce its rates.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, what I meant to suggest was that the disparity does not exist to the same extent when we compare the rates of the publicly owned and operated plant in New York with the rates of the publicly owned and operated plant in Canada.

Mr. NORRIS. No; not by any means. All these rates that I put in the RECORD the other day for electricity supplied by private companies in various New York municipalities are much higher, and, as this letter of Mr. Carlson says, in some places more than double what the municipally owned plant at Jamestown is charging its customers and making money while it is doing it.

SALE OF COTTON AND GRAIN IN FUTURE MARKETS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, there is pending a unanimous-consent request for a limitation of debate. I rose for the purpose of making the point of no quorum. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asked me to yield so that he might make his remarks.

I desire to say that I have no opposition to the agreement for a limitation of debate; but I shall make the point of no quorum for the reason that I think a limitation of debate, since it has the effect ultimately of ending debate, ought to come under the rule which prohibits an agreement to end debate and take a vote except after the roll has been called.

I am for the bill, and I am in favor of this limitation of debate; but I make the point of no quorum because I feel that there should be a quorum here before any such unanimous-consent agreement is acted on.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, at what time will the Senate proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senate will at 12.55 o'clock proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DILL. That will give time. I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edwards	King	Smith
Barkley	Fess	McMaster	Smoot
Bayard	Fletcher	McNary	Steck
Bingham	Frazier	Mayfield	Steiwer

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to state that my colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is necessarily absent from the Senate on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I wish to renew my request for unanimous consent to limit debate on the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Arkansas.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Agreed, by unanimous consent, that, beginning at 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of February 13, 1929, no Senator may speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes upon the bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets, or any amendment that may be pending thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, this is a very important bill, especially to the South and to the West, and while I do not know that I shall say anything at all on it myself, I do not think I shall, I do not believe it is proper to cut off debate at 4 o'clock this afternoon to the extent suggested. If the request is made for to-morrow afternoon, I shall not object.

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope the Senator from Alabama will not object. We have debated the bill very fully, and under the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement suggested by the Senator from Arkansas we can still have 20 minutes on the bill and 20 minutes on any amendment that may be pending.

Mr. CARAWAY. Any Senator could have 40 minutes. There is to be an amendment offered, and any Senator who desires could have 40 minutes, 20 on the bill and 20 on the amendment.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not wish to press my views too much, but I think we can have the bill pretty fully discussed under the 20-minute suggestion, with an additional 20 minutes on the amendment, as the Senator suggests.

Mr. BLACK. I think the probability is that we shall get through with the debate more quickly if there be no limit at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. The unanimous-consent request provides for 20 minutes on the bill and 20 minutes on any amendment pending?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is my interpretation of it. That is what I intended.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that would be ample.

Mr. RANSDELL. It is 20 minutes on the amendment and 20 minutes on the bill?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is what I understood.

Mr. BLACK. I am perfectly willing to agree to a limitation to go into effect to-morrow afternoon at 4 o'clock, but I am not willing to agree to a limitation to-day.

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope that debate will have been exhausted under the ordinary process before that time. I shall not request that we have a limitation to-morrow, because I think we will have disposed of the bill long before 4 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

CADETSHIPS IN THE COAST GUARD

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a few days ago when the Senate passed a bill authorizing the erection of new Coast Guard buildings at New London a question was asked by the Senator from North Carolina as to how appointments are made for cadetships at the Coast Guard Academy. I have just received from the Treasury Department an announcement of a competitive examination for the appointment of cadets to be held in June, and in view of the interest taken by certain Senators in that matter, I ask that the announcement may be read and printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE UNITED STATES COAST GUARD WILL HOLD A COMPETITIVE EXAMINATION FOR APPOINTMENT OF CADETS JUNE 26–28, 1929

An exceptional opportunity is offered young men of the right caliber to complete their education at Government expense and to become commissioned officers in the United States Coast Guard, one of the military services of the United States afloat and ashore.

The age limits for appointment of cadets are 18 to 22 years. An applicant who has passed his twenty-second birthday is ineligible for appointment.

Cadets are trained and educated at the Coast Guard Academy, New London, Conn., and each summer are taken on an extended practice cruise. Cadets receive the same pay and allowances as midshipmen in the Navy ($780 per annum and one ration per day—80 cents).

Upon graduation, after three years at the academy, a cadet is eligible to be commissioned an ensign. Commissioned officers in the Coast Guard rank with officers in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and receive corresponding pay and allowances, grade for grade.

Educational examination for cadets precedes the physical and takes two days. Applicants for cadetship of the required moral character who present satisfactory certificates that they have completed the equivalent of a 4-year high-school course and have received 14 credits in subjects prescribed by Coast Guard headquarters are required to take a written examination in mathematics (algebra and geometry), history, and English. A high-school graduate should be able to pass the examination.

The examination is strictly competitive and is open to young men who possess the qualifications with respect to age, education, and character. Examinations will be held at such places throughout the United States where it is found practicable to have examining boards and the number of candidates warrant.

The successful candidates who are tendered appointments will be ordered to report to the Superintendent of the Coast Guard Academy on or about September 1, 1929. They will be allowed 5 cents per mile to cover travel expenses from the place of appointment to the academy. Upon arrival at the academy a cadet will be required to deposit the sum of $200 to be applied to the purchase of necessary uniforms and equipment. Pay and allowances received are adequate to cover all expenses while at the academy.

For further particulars write to the Commandant United States Coast Guard, Washington, D. C.

JANUARY 29, 1929.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he will not also include in the RECORD a statement of the places where such examinations are to be held, if he has such information.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have nothing further in regard to the matter except what was read.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask to have appended to the announcement just read a list of the places at which examinations will be held. I obtained the list from Coast Guard headquarters this morning.

The list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALE OF COTTON AND GRAIN IN FUTURE MARKETS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if there is anybody else who desires to speak at this time I shall be glad to yield to him, as I am not particularly anxious to make any remarks just at this moment.

I send to the clerk's desk and ask to have read the following letter addressed to me and signed by J. A. Taylor, chairman of the traffic committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Wilmington, N. C.

I want to say, before this letter is read, that Mr. Taylor is regarded in North Carolina as authority upon the subject discussed by him in this letter. He is a large wholesale merchant in next to the largest city in the cotton-growing belt, a city from which about 500,000 bales of cotton are generally exported annually. He has been a student of questions connected with the marketing of farm products and other questions pertaining to the business of agriculture. I wish to have Mr. Taylor's letter read in full, because I think it very informative and very sound in its conclusions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The clerk will read.

The letter was read, as follows:

WILMINGTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE (INC.),
Wilmington, N. C., February 6, 1929.

Senator F. M. SIMMONS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SIMMONS: I have just received a copy of the Caraway bill, entitled "To prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets," and have read same with profound astonishment. There isn't a provision in the bill which, in my opinion, discovers any real knowledge of the inseparable relation of the contract market to stable values, and on the whole I consider the bill the gravest menace to agricultural interests and beg your careful consideration to the following:

1. Agricultural products being seasonal depend for their market upon some method of distributing the movement over a long period at related and fixed prices, and where such a system does not obtain the spot demand determines the market value; which means that by eliminating the buyer for future requirements the market becomes a one-sided affair, and the seller is made the victim of the spot buyer.

2. The economic effect of a future market is to make prices for the entire production equated on the basis of supply and demand at varying prices measured by delivery periods. Were such a system not in effect the marketing of the crop would depress the price just in the degree that receipts exceeded current demand, while with the system in operation the future market sustains the spot price by distributing the supply over a long period.

3. Cotton mills are able to operate continuously only because and to the extent they can protect their future wants at ascertained and fixed costs, and the elimination of the future contract system would operate to restrict the mills to a hand-to-mouth policy and shift the burden of carrying the stock of raw material to the farmer. The practice among cotton factors is to sell to mills for long-deferred delivery, and by this facility the twofold result is accomplished, that the farmer finds an open and constant market for his product and the mills the means of future sales and continuous operation. The factor is enabled to insure these future requirements only through the machinery of the contract market, and in the nature of the case does not know, and can not know, from whom or through whom he will receive his supplies. Nor is such knowledge a matter of interest to the mills or a thing of value to the farmer; but both are vitally concerned, the one as the seller and the other as the buyer, in maintaining an open market for their needs.

4. The bill applies equally to grain and cotton, and while without accurate knowledge of the grain market, I think there is reason to believe that the commodities would be differently affected. Grain and its products have a direct consumptive market measured roughly by population, while cotton is limited to comparatively few channels of direct distribution. By reason of wide distribution grain and its products would not feel the effect of the restrictions imposed by the bill in the same degree as cotton, for while everybody is a potential consumer of cotton products, everybody is an actual consumer of grain products, and the immediate and constant current demand would likely contribute in a measure to sustain prices of these products. But the assumption conceded, the bill is vicious in principle and, if enacted, could have no other effect than to harm what it professes to help.

5. Exchange operations being necessary to stabilize prices, it follows that the freer the market the better, and economic considerations alone should regulate commercial machinery. The statute law has no place here except for defining broad fundamental principles, and commercial custom and usage should be left free to supply the means within the law.

6. The price of cotton has been unsatisfactory for several years, and the record of exchange transactions will disclose that both positively and relatively the interest of the public in the cotton market has decreased. At present, with underlying bullish conditions, the market should be doing much better, and the stagnant condition which has characterized the market for the past few months, and the decline in price which has taken place the past few weeks, can be accounted for only by the absence of public interest. What the market needs is active and sustained public interest, and if the falling away of public interest has produced the conditions described, only the imagination can fancy what would be the effect on the price of cotton should the public be forbidden by law to enter the market—and the farmer would have to bear the cumulative burden.

I hope you are in position to oppose the bill, for I can not recall a proposed piece of legislation so menacing to the interest of the South, and so calculated to disturb and disrupt a marketing system worked out through long years of world experience, and upon the integrity of which so largely depend our economic soundness and social well-being.

With personal regards.

Faithfully yours,

J. A. TAYLOR,
Chairman Traffic Committee, Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I also send to the desk and ask to have read a telegram from the Raleigh Clearing House Association, of Raleigh, N. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The telegram was read as follows:

RALEIGH, N. C., January 28, 1929.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Senator CARAWAY's bill (S. 1093) relative to hedging cotton, if passed, will be very injurious to cotton mills, and dealers and farmers urge you to oppose the measure.

RALEIGH CLEARING HOUSE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. SIMMONS. I also wish to have read from the desk a telegram from the president of the Atlantic Cotton Association, representing North Carolina and a number of other cotton-growing States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The telegram was read, as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., December 29, 1928.

Hon. FURNIFOLD M. SIMMONS,
Senator from North Carolina, Washington, D. C.:

Please refer to Senate bill No. 1093, introduced by Senator CARAWAY, entitled "A bill to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets." The Atlantic Cotton Association numbers among its members the majority of the cotton shippers of the States of Alabama, Georgia, North and South Carolina, and Virginia, who buy and sell actual cotton for both domestic and foreign consumption and find constant use of the cotton future exchanges for hedging of their purchases and sales. Our association considers the cotton future markets an actual necessity to the marketing of the cotton crop, and further consider that the bill referred to above would result in the closing of our cotton exchanges and the disrupting of the cotton marketing system. We respectfully urge, therefore, that you vigorously oppose Senate bill No. 1093, introduced by Senator CARAWAY.

J. S. BILLINGSLEA,
President Atlantic Cotton Association.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for only a very short time, to give expression to some general views I have upon the subject of this bill, without any purpose or desire to enter into a detailed discussion of it.

If I understand the Caraway bill, its enactment into law would be almost sure, if not altogether certain, to close the cotton exchanges of the country. If it should have that effect, and I think it would if enacted, I believe the result would be very disastrous to the cotton interests of the South.

I do not underestimate the abuses which in recent years have crept into the various exchanges, not only the cotton exchanges but those having to do with wheat and other products. Those abuses seem to grow instead of decreasing, and undoubtedly there is necessity for some sort of legislation intended and calculated to remove those abuses, and to force those organizations to conduct business upon proper and legitimate lines.

Because a body politic is sick is no reason for its destruction. Because an institution has been abused is no reason for destroying it, if it is, in its essence and nature, when properly administered, beneficial and helpful.

I do not know of a single country, certainly I do not know of any great commercial country in the world, where there are not exchanges similar to those we have in this country for the purpose of marketing, buying, and selling certain staple products of the several countries and of the world. Great Britain has one, and Great Britain is in a certain sense almost as deeply interested in the American cotton industry as the American people themselves. Germany, France, Italy, all the great advanced nations of Europe, in which there are located factories engaged in the manufacture of cotton, are profoundly interested in that industry in this country. They all have exchanges. If the American cotton exchange is destroyed, that does not destroy the British cotton exchange or the German or French cotton exchanges. If the world price of cotton is to be fixed in the United States, as I think it is, and if the bill is passed, I do not believe that in the future the world price of cotton will be fixed in the United States. I think it will be fixed in Liverpool. If we will not permit this kind of a market in this country, of course, those who are interested in the existence of an institution where the prices of this product may be stabilized will have to transfer, and will transfer, their activities to the foreign markets, and that will result in a condition which I do not believe anyone in this country desires to bring about.

There is a great deal of talk about the effect of the exchanges upon prices. I was very much amazed on yesterday at the position taken by the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the author of the Capper bill, which was intended to control abuses with reference to wheat in the wheat exchanges of the country. I had been under the impression that that act had operated not entirely satisfactorily but had operated at least to remove many objectionable practices in the wheat exchange and that the wheat growers of the country, while not entirely satisfied with it, regarded it as very valuable legislation. I was surprised to hear the Senator from Kansas repudiate his measure, but I was more surprised to hear him argue that because there were certain fictitious trades, as he characterized them, in the markets by which a lot of wheat which did not exist was sold, that the amount of those sales added to the real sales deceived the public as to the amount of wheat raised in the country. The same argument, I believe, was applied to cotton, that the amount of fictitious sales was added to the amount of the actual sales and brought about a confusion of views and misunderstanding on the part of interested people as to what was the real amount of cotton or wheat produced in this country and as to what was the demand for cotton and wheat in the country.

Mr. President, I know and everybody knows that there are sold on the cotton exchanges of the country many times more bales of cotton than are produced; that there are sold upon the wheat exchanges of the country many times more bushels of wheat than are produced in the country, and that a large part of those transactions are paper transactions. But, Mr. President, nobody is deceived by those paper transactions as to the amount of cotton or wheat that is produced in the country. We have absolutely authoritative and official reports, as well as private reports, as to the amount of cotton and the amount of wheat produced in the country, and we know, not altogether exactly, but approximately, the amount of cotton and the amount of wheat that is consumed in this country and in the world, and what part of that cotton and wheat this country furnishes. We know how much wheat is produced in the world and in this country, and how much the demands of this country and of the world for wheat are, so that it makes no difference how many paper transactions take place upon exchanges, nobody of ordinary intelligence who would undertake to keep up with the market or deal with the market is deceived or can be deceived as to the amount of cotton or wheat produced or the amount of one or the other or both consumed in this country and in the world.

That was the gravamen and the basis of the argument which the distinguished Senator from Kansas made to the Senate yesterday. It has no foundation in fact. I see in front of me two Senators who, I think, know more about this question than any of their colleagues as far as cotton is concerned, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and I ask them if there is anything in the argument that the fictitious sales are calculated to or do mislead anybody as to the amount of actual cotton consumed and produced in this country or in the world?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to answer his question, I will state to him that in my judgment they do not deceive anyone. In regard to the so-called fictitious paper sales, let me remind the Senator that a former president of the New York Exchange, Mr. Marsh, in testifying before a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry last year, stated that 80 to 85 per cent of all the transactions on the exchange were perfectly legitimate; that a great many of them were hedging or insurance, insuring legitimate transactions; that only about 15 to 20 per cent of them could in any way be called speculative or gambling. But they do not deceive anyone, as the Senator has so well said. We have innumerable reports from the Department of Agriculture of the Federal Government and from the State agricultural departments showing what the crops are both of cotton and wheat. No one is deceived—absolutely not.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me just a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon me? If the Senator wishes to interrupt to ask a question, I have no objection. If he wants to read something, I would rather he would wait until I conclude.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to show the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] that the Chicago Board of Trade does not agree with him on that matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. CARAWAY. A report from Chicago on March 17, 1925, showed "Trading in wheat and grains all strong. Reports that Arthur W. Cutter was getting out of his line developed a panic in the local pit during the early session. Wheat lost 14 cents a bushel." That was just on a rumor that this man was getting out, and yet he did not sell or buy a bushel of actual wheat.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not deny and nobody will deny that there is speculation on the exchanges, not only in cotton and wheat but in stocks and bonds and every kind of product; and that it does temporarily dislocate the market, sometimes up and sometimes down. Corners are made and corners are broken. Combinations and control of market for a few days make a fictitious price, but are broken; and a fictitious price in the other direction is made. That is undoubtedly true, but the tendency of the exchanges properly conducted is to stabilize and fix prices and to advise the producers and consumers of the products throughout the country and the manipulators of products throughout the country of a basis upon which they can rely in their operation.

The question is of deep interest to two special industries, one the spinning industry in this country and the other the cotton-growing industry in this country. First let me briefly and in general terms state the situation with reference to the spinners.

I think no one will underestimate the industry of cotton manufacturing in the United States. It is one of the very largest industries in the country. It gives employment to immense numbers of laborers, and in it an enormous amount of capital is invested. It is of first importance to the manufacturers that there should be a stabilization of the price of the raw material which enters into the manufactured product. They operate upon the basis of orders for future delivery. A great number of orders are received, probably enough to keep the factory in operation for months, probably half the year. They must buy their raw material in the market and pay the market price. Their goods are to be delivered later. If the price of the raw material should materially drop, say, in the case of cotton, from 20 to 12 cents a pound, and if the millers have no way of protecting themselves against that slump, then they face a very serious situation.

They face the identical situation that a man engaged in business faces when he contemplates the danger of fire. They can not safely sell on long-time orders unless there is some way in which they can insure themselves against a change in the market price of the raw cotton, which will be disastrous to them. Hence, it is the uniform custom of the millers, without exception, so far as I know—and if there is an exception, I wish the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] would bring it to the attention of the Senate now—it is the uniform custom, just as it is the uniform custom of merchants to insure the houses in which they are doing business, to buy for future delivery, so that in case of fluctuation they may be protected. It is an insurance. It is not resorted to for purposes of speculation, but for insurance. The men who engage in this great business would find it very hazardous but for this facility by which they are enabled to protect themselves. If we should destroy the exchanges, there would be no way by which they could protect themselves through insurance; and no mortal man can tell what would be the effect of such action upon the textile industry of the country.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield, but I have not much strength to give to the few remarks that I am making.

Mr. BROOKHART. Very well. I will ask the question later of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield if the Senator wishes; but I merely wanted to make some general observations. I do not desire to go into any detail.

Now, Mr. President, we come to the farmer. Cotton is a peculiar product in some respects. In a modified sense, the South has a monopoly in cotton, almost a world monopoly, because we supply a very large percentage of the demand of the world. The price of cotton is regulated by supply and demand, primarily. If the machinery of the markets is open—if the facilities for sale, future and present, are open and free—the amount of cotton we produce will fix the price. If it is a very short crop, the price will be good; if it is a very heavy crop, the price will be low; but if there is no machinery to regulate the price, then, like the producer of any other general commodity that is not subject to having its price fixed or affected by exchange transactions, the cotton farmer would have to seek a market where he could find it; and the only market open to him would be that of the manufacturers.

The manufacturers, of course, are interested in getting cotton at the lowest possible price. They would have to buy stingily and live from hand to mouth, so to speak, if we should destroy the exchanges. They could not hedge against loss. They would buy in small amounts. There would be bargaining and trafficking in every community about what the price should be and what the manufacturers would give for cotton, just as there is about cattle and hogs in communities which are situated far from Chicago; as there is about eggs and chickens and other commodities of that sort. There would be no stabilized price; there would be no customer except one who is interested in forcing the price down to the lowest possible point, and that purchaser a cripple, so that he could not afford to sell on long orders, because he would have no insurance against loss. There would be a crippled purchaser, and only one purchaser, with the possibility of combinations between purchasers.

Mr. SMITH. And there would be distressed sellers.

Mr. SIMMONS. And there would be distressed sellers.

I have never seen but one time in my life when there was no cotton exchange and when there was no fixed and established price for cotton, no price that attached to a bale of cotton just the same in one part of the country as it did in another part of the country; a price that the farmer when he carried his cotton to market knew he would get. That was in 1914. I do not know how long the period was. Some one has stated that it was three months, but I think it was longer than that. The distress in my section of the country was so great that, perhaps because I was interested in cotton, while the period during which the exchanges remained closed may have been only three months, it seemed to me a year. Cotton during that time was hawked about the streets. Some offered 5 cents a pound for it; some offered 6 cents for it; some offered 8 cents, and some one else would say, "If you will take it out in trade" or "If you will let it go on some account, I will give you 10 cents for it."

Mr. SMITH. We had the "Buy a bale of cotton" movement, as the Senator will remember.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. Then, because of the distress and disorganization and the lack of a fixed market price for cotton, there was started the "Buy a bale of cotton" movement throughout the country. It gained a great deal of headway and was designed to relieve the cotton farmer of the distressful situation in which he found himself as the result of this condition.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question, does he believe the closing of the exchanges was the cause of the cotton market breaking?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think it was the only cause, but I think it was one of the chief causes.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the exchanges had stayed open, then, they would have held up the price?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think they could have done so, but I do not know that they could have stabilized the price to the same extent as now.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why did they close?

Mr. SIMMONS. I presume they closed because of world conditions.

Mr. CARAWAY. They closed because they could not control the price.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know why——

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator have any idea?

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply know they suspended. The Senator may know the reason; I do not know the reason. I suppose it was because of general disorganization, due to world conditions, affecting world trade and interfering with world trade, that these associations decided to suspend, but I say that suspension was disastrous to the farmer.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I was coming to. The Senator thinks if the exchanges had stayed open the price would have been better?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it would.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why did the men who were already long on the market quit and allow themselves to be absolutely ruined? Why did they not keep the exchanges open so that they could unload on the public, as is usually done?

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose these exchanges are controlled by majorities, as are other bodies.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to read a telegram from the president of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange and one from the president of the New York Cotton Exchange setting forth why the exchanges closed?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. RANSDELL. I asked the question and have here the answers, if the Senator from North Carolina will permit me to read them. The telegrams are not very long. I wired yesterday. I will read the answer, as follows:

> Exchanges closed on outbreak of World War because of chaotic conditions resulting from dislocation international finances and marine insurance, severe difficulties in shipments owing to shipping control by various governments engaged in world conflict, and because of general confusion resulting from declaration of war. American cotton exchanges remained closed from July 31, 1914, to November 14, 1914. All exchanges all over world closed at outbreak of war. As soon as conditions warranted and military control established and defined and financial conditions stabilized sufficiently, exchanges reopened. During period exchanges dealing in cotton were closed innumerable telegrams and letters were received from producers, merchants, bankers, and trade urging exchanges to reopen, because business could not be conducted in orderly manner without exchanges functioning. Spot cotton values were demoralized and irregular, prices differing as much as a cent a pound in adjacent territories. The reopening of the cotton exchanges resulted immediately in an increased demand for spot cotton and a progressive advance in cotton values.

> J. P. HENICAN, President.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. As soon as I read the telegram from the president of the New York Exchange I will be glad to answer any question, with the permission of the Senator from North Carolina. The telegram I have just read is from Mr. Henican, president of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. I have here a very brief telegram from the president of the New York Cotton Exchange addressed to me, in which he says:

At request of President Henican, may inform you my cotton exchange was closed from July 31 to November 16, 1914, owing European war. Exchange was reopened at urgent request of entire trade, as during closing period price of cotton had declined the lowest in years, in spite of obvious fact that war would materially increase cotton consumption rather than the reverse. During closing period cotton sold at 5 cents in South, but exchange reopened at 7 cents, and value continued to advance to 43¾ by 1920.

GARDNER H. MILLER, President.

Mr. CARAWAY. Now may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator from North Carolina will permit me, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CARAWAY. Neither one of the telegrams said that the exchanges thought they would have kept the price of cotton up if they had stayed open, did they?

Mr. RANSDELL. I read what they said.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the Senator ask them that question?

Mr. RANSDELL. I asked them to tell me why the exchanges closed during that period, and this is their reply.

Mr. CARAWAY. I asked the Senator if he asked them if it would have kept the price up if the exchanges had remained open.

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not ask that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why did not the Senator ask that?

Mr. RANSDELL. Because I was not smart enough; I did not know the Senator was going to want that information. I thought they were intelligent men, and if I asked them why the exchanges closed and remained closed they would answer me. I did ask that question and I have read their replies.

Mr. CARAWAY. The other was the question I asked the Senator, and I see he avoided asking them about it.

Mr. President, may I read something from one whom the Senator from North Carolina said a few moments ago is the greatest authority on cotton? I believe he said that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] knew more about it than anybody else.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not say he knew more about it than anybody else. I said that he and Senator RANSDELL probably knew more about it than any two Senators in this body.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I read the Senator what the Senator from South Carolina said in the bill that he introduced on the 3d of last May?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly; I have no objection if the Senator from South Carolina has not any.

Mr. CARAWAY. He said—that the transactions and prices of cotton on such cotton-futures exchanges are susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control, and sudden or unreasonable fluctuations in the prices thereof frequently occur as a result of such speculation, manipulation, or control, which are detrimental to the producer or the consumer and the persons handling cotton in interstate commerce; that such speculation, manipulation, or control is frequently effectuated, and such sudden or unreasonable fluctuations of prices are at times brought about by purchases or sales of future contracts in large quantities by some person acting alone or in association with other persons or affiliations.

That is what the Senator from South Carolina last May said was the condition of the cotton trade.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have no brief for the cotton exchange. I have no sympathy with the gambling transactions to which the Senator from Arkansas has referred. I recognize the fact that there are speculative movements in the market on the stock exchange of a character that are very hurtful and very reprehensible; and they ought to be, if possible, suppressed. I have no defense to make of any of the abuses that have been complained of by the Senator from South Carolina or other Senators who have spoken upon this subject. I recognize that abuses have crept in, and they have grown to an extent that justifies the Government of the United States in interfering and, by reform legislation, eradicating those abuses. But, Mr. President, the question of reforming abuses in an institution that is subserving a good public purpose when legitimately conducted is a far different question from utterly destroying that system without setting up anything in its place.

I have no doubt that these speculative movements in cotton have sometimes operated very much against the farmer when the bears had control of the market; but when the bulls had control of the market they have operated in favor of the farmer. If they are purely speculative, Mr. President, they ought to be controlled by the Government; but the transactions that take place upon the exchange that are legitimate and legal, that protect the cotton millers of this country, that furnish them a source of indemnity against loss, that establish and maintain upon a stable basis the price of the farmer's cotton, ought not to be interfered with; and these cotton mills, among the greatest industries in our country, and these cotton farmers, who produce a product that brings enormous wealth to this country, ought not to be deprived of the benefits of the legitimate operation of that institution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. I am through.

Mr. HEFLIN. Just let me make a suggestion. I do not want to take the Senator from North Carolina off his feet; but I agree with the Senator that the spinner ought to have a place to hedge. When a spinner buys spot cotton, I think he ought to have an opportunity to have somebody who is willing to buy his contract to carry the insurance, as some term it. That is legitimate, because the spinner is a consumer of cotton. If the spinner has an opportunity to hedge in the present bill, that would be very helpful, indeed; and if the farmer who had spot cotton wanted to sell a contract against it, he ought to have the right to do it, and he does have that right under the provisions of this bill. The merchant who buys cotton can do the same.

That is legitimate speculation; but they speculate on the exchanges in the United States to the extent of 200,000,000 bales of cotton or more in a year. We are making a crop of only 14,000,000 bales. If we could confine this dealing to hedging, we would have contracts sold on 14,000,000 bales, and with 14,000,000 bales of spot cotton added to that, we would have 28,000,000 bales dealt in in one year as against 200,000,000 bales of fictitious stuff called cotton now bought and sold on the exchanges. I think four-fifths of that speculation is harmful. The kind of speculation that I have just mentioned is legitimate because back of every bale sold on contract there would be a bale of actual cotton.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to answer just that point?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am through.

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me make just one brief statement, then.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I answered the statement of the Senator before he made it, and I do not think I ought to repeat it.

Mr. RANSDELL. I only want to say to the Senator, as I am sure he will remember, that when we were having our hearings last year the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] was presiding, and this question was asked of Mr. Marsh, who, as the Senator will recollect, was prosecuting—I do not think I use the term improperly—the firm of Mr. Henry Clayton, of Texas; and I do not know but that the Senator from Alabama may have asked the question:

What percentage of the transactions on the cotton exchanges are really legitimate hedging, and what percentage of the transactions are speculative?

Mr. Marsh answered that 80 to 85 per cent were legitimate, and only 15 to 20 per cent speculative. Some one asked Mr. Henry Clayton what he thought was the amount of the speculative transactions, and how much was legitimate. He said he thought Mr. Marsh had erred somewhat in saying that the legitimate transactions amounted to as much as 80 to 85 per cent. He doubted if they would run over 60 per cent; but he was satisfied that fully 60 per cent of all the transactions on the cotton exchanges were legitimate hedging or insurance transactions.

I do not pretend to know as to that, but those two gentlemen did know. Mr. Marsh for years was president of the cotton exchange. He is a very able economist. I understand that he has written books on the subject; and he certainly impressed me as one of the most dignified, able men I ever heard testify before a Senate committee. Mr. Clayton also impressed me as an extremely able man. So I think it is safe to say, from the testimony of those two men who were summoned before our committee to look into the question of cotton, that fully 60 to 85 per cent of all the transactions on the exchange are legitimate transactions.

I want to say just one word more in response to a suggestion from my friend about the evils on these exchanges.

Mr. HEFLIN. Before the Senator does that——

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me make this statement, and then I will yield.

Doubtless there are evils now, and doubtless there have been evils in the past. The Senator recalls well that along about 1913 we had prolonged hearings in order to correct some of the so-called evils of the cotton exchanges, the result being what has been known ever since as the Smith-Lever law. It was, in a way, a Magna Charta to the business on the cotton exchanges of the county. The Smith-Lever Act, passed in 1914, was first declared unconstitutional. It was reenacted in 1916 and has functioned wonderfully.

I should like to say, in behalf of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, that if anybody in recent years has presented evils connected with the New Orleans Exchange, I have not heard them. Before our committee there was a searching investigation which the Senator from South Carolina and his associates conducted, and certain alleged evils connected with the New York Exchange were set forth. A great deal was said about that; and in order to correct those evils Mr. VINSON of Georgia introduced a bill in the House, and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] introduced a bill in the Senate, and secured a favorable report on it; but after the Congress closed I understand that the New York Exchange voluntarily adopted and put into effect rules of its own, which substantially corrected the evils complained of. It did that voluntarily.

I do not know what evils need correcting by the legislature at this time. Certainly no one has charged any evils connected with the New Orleans Cotton Exchange except this general idea of speculating too much which the Senator from Arkansas alleges; but the particular evils no man has stated.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator if he would not be willing, if he could, to eliminate the part of the speculation that is not legitimate? Mr. Clayton said he thought 60 per cent was legitimate. Therefore, 40 per cent would be illegitimate. Mr. Marsh said 85 per cent was legitimate, and that would leave 15 per cent illegitimate. If the Senator could, he would be willing to reach and eliminate that; would he not?

Mr. RANSDELL. If that could be reached in any business-like, proper way, I should not object at all. I am no champion of the speculators and gamblers, I assure the Senator; but I have never yet found anyone who was able to suggest a method by which the good could be separated from the bad.

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not lay my hand on Mr. Hines's testimony just now, but my recollection is that he is the representative or president of the Cotton Textile Institute. In response to a question that I asked, I believe, as to what per cent of cotton the mills obtained through the exchanges, I think he said 1 per cent or less than 1 per cent of their total cotton supply. I was astounded to find that it was so little as that, although I never thought they obtained very much through the exchanges; but in all the transactions that are had in that kind of speculation in 200,000,000 bales of cotton in a year, selling back and forth, of course they are selling stuff that does not exist, selling stuff that they do not own, and something that they can not deliver. That is an evil that must be stopped.

For instance, if the farmer has his cotton ginned and ready for the market, and the price is low and unprofitable, a price that will not justify him in selling, under the present-day regulations and manipulations of the exchanges he says: "I will keep my cotton off the market. I am not going to sell just now. I am going to hold it until the price gets better." But the speculator, regardless of the fact that the farmer is refusing to sell, goes upon the exchange and sells cotton contracts when the farmer, holding the actual cotton off the market, is refusing to part with it to any spot buyer in the land at the price then obtaining.

The speculator goes on the exchange and sells a fictitious stuff called cotton in unlimited quantities, and he is seeking to beat down the price of real cotton still lower, while the farmer is holding it for the price to go higher. There is a battle on between these forces. One of the elements makes its money out of the bear side of the market. When cotton goes down and they beat the price to pieces, they make a killing, and they kill the farmer's business. Then he has lost by his effort to hold for a better price. He has a right to use his price-fixing power in obtaining a price that will yield a profit, and in his effort to do it he is being punished by a man who does not own cotton, who can sell in competition with real cotton stuff out of the air and call it cotton. He can sell a thousand bales or 10,000 bales or 10,000,000 bales without having a lock of cotton to sell, and in the meantime he is beating down the price of real cotton, because every morning before the merchant will buy that farmer's cotton in the market places of the South he waits for a telegram to come from the exchanges, and he goes by that telegram giving the quotations of what cotton sold for the day before and what it opened at that day, and he buys the cotton on the basis of those figures that come to the local markets each day from the cotton exchanges.

Who fixes the price? All sorts of people speculating on the exchange. What I want to do is to confine speculation more nearly to the amount of cotton actually produced each year. If we make a cotton crop of 14,000,000 bales, let them speculate in 14,000,000 bales, so as to have a bale of actual cotton back of every bale in a contract. For instance, if the spinner consumes, as he does, 6,000,000 bales, let him hedge to the extent of 6,000,000 bales. I would not deprive him of that right. I think he ought to have it, and I want him to have it, and I will vote for him to have it. If there are any other elements in the trade who deal in actual cotton, I am willing for them to have the right to hedge, and to that extent deal in cotton on an exchange. But I am ready to vote, and I will vote, for a measure that will stop this dealing in unlimited quantities of fictitious stuff called cotton.

There is an orgy of gambling going on to-day in Wall Street in stocks that is shaking the financial fabric of the Nation.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am so amused at this "legitimate" business, which requires 200,000,000 bales of cotton in order to legitimately sell 10,000,000; which is what is actually sold, because we must subtract from the total twelve or thirteen or fourteen million bales of staple cotton. According to the statements of these great economists which we have just heard, it takes $2,000,000,000 to hedge 10,000,000 bales of cotton. At the present exchange charges it would cost $30,000,000. In other words, they have to put up $2,000,000,000, and lose the interest on that, and pay $30,000,000 for the privilege of handling, with this hedge, 10,000,000 bales of cotton. Senators can make the calculation themselves.

Mr. HEFLIN. According to those figures, the spinner would be infinitely better off if he should buy his whole supply of cotton even if he had to pay storage charges on it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, he would better buy it. He would not have so much money in it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was speaking a moment ago about the gambling craze that is on in New York. The money needed in every State of the Union to carry on the legitimate business of the people is being drawn into the gambling haunts of that eastern city. They are offering all sorts of interest rates. Money is at a premium. Of course, we understand that the man who has idle money would like to lend that money where he could get the best rate of interest—that is natural. But it is unfair to the honest business men and women engaged in lawful and helpful enterprises, who are supporting the Government and feeding and clothing the world, to make the interest rate so high around the gambling center, where people are dealing in fictitious stuff, as to draw money out of the channels of legitimate business in this country.

Somewhere in this country a man will want to cut down a forest, he will want to set up a sawmill and cut the trees into lumber, but he can not pay 10 or 12 or 15 per cent interest for money. When he goes to a bank in some of the States for money and they tell him, "We can get a larger rate of interest in New York than you are willing to pay, and we are sending the money there," that man is being denied the money with which to cut his forest and saw his timber into planks, material for building houses and bridges that span the rivers, and for various other purposes. These legitimate and necessary enterprises are made to wait; they must remain undeveloped while the dance and the revelry of the gamblers goes on in Wall Street. That is the sad and deplorable situation that confronts us.

Here is a statement from one of the sages of the Nation, one of the best beloved men in our country, and one who has contributed greatly to human comfort and betterment in his day and generation. I refer to Mr. Thomas A. Edison. He is down in Florida now renewing his youth in the sunny land of Dixie, and this statement was made just day before yesterday. He condemned increasing stock speculation and predicted that if it was not checked it would ultimately produce a panic.

Mr. President, think of what a crime it would be to tie up the money supply of the Nation, the greatest Nation in all the world, to have the lifeblood of its business—and that is what money and credit are—tied up in a gambling center and producing paralysis in legitimate enterprises in the various States. We will reach the time, unless certain kinds of speculation is stopped, when we will have a panic, and the crash will come.

It would be a good idea to have a man like "Old Hickory" Jackson President when that time came. When old Nicholas Biddle once told President Jackson that he was going to cause a panic, "Old Hickory" said: "If you do, damn you, I will hang you."

No man or set of men must be allowed to produce a panic in the United States. Whoever dares to do such a thing must be surely punished, and the instrument with which he does it should be destroyed.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. The difficulty about this, I want to suggest to my friend from Alabama—and he is one of the best friends I have—is that the very power that is invoked now, namely, the Federal Reserve Board, to intervene to raise the rate of interest, or, by any rate of interest, deny credit, in order to bring about a cessation of that orgy of gambling in New York and elsewhere in stocks and bonds, exercised its power in 1920, to the ruin of this entire Nation.

The Senator stood here for weeks and weeks denouncing the action of the Federal Reserve Board, which intervened when all farm products were at their peak, with the result, speaking of the matter now under discussion, that cotton, which was around 35 or 40 cents in the fall and spring preceding, dropped to something like 7 or 8 cents the next year. All other unprotected commodities suffered in like manner to such an extent that, in my opinion, the foundation was laid for the present disastrous condition of agriculture, which brought about the cry for agricultural relief.

I do not know what we are to do in a democratic country to control the spirit of speculation. I do not know whether we would be justified in giving the power of control to a board of governors. I do not know how we are to go about determining what an individual shall do with his own money or his own legitimate bases of credit. Those are questions which strike right at the foundation and the root of our democratic form of government. Perhaps we may have made a fatal mistake when we delegated to certain individuals the right to furnish this Government with a circulating medium. These are tremendous questions; they are questions which we can not, in an hour, or in any short time, solve so that our action would work to the benefit of the entire country.

I shudder when I think of what occurred in 1920, and I remember the deadening effect of that action of the Federal Reserve Board and its allied councilmen on the securities of the United States, worth par at maturity, with accrued interest if it had not been collected in the meantime. Even the bonds of the United States went down to something like 85 and 86 cents on the dollar, showing the effect on the obligations of our Government when held in weak hands, even with the taxing power and the resources of this country back of them. The Senator knows, and I know, that they had been distributed all over this country, and the patriotic citizens who really were not able had invested in those bonds.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator will remember that the Federal Reserve Board, of which Governor Harding was the head at the time, sent the order out to the banks over the country not to lend money on Government bonds, and many people were forced to sell them when they could not borrow on their bonds from the banks; and they had to sell them for 80 and 85 cents on the dollar.

Mr. SMITH. Precisely; that is what I am trying to call to the attention of my friend. Are we here now invoking the activities and the power of a body created by this Government; and are we to put into its hands the power of life and death over the industrial and commercial and financial fabric of the American people?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not in favor of that. I did not go far enough with my proposition. I had not gone far enough when he interrupted me to let the Senator know how I stood. I am not in favor of giving that power to the Federal Reserve Board; and I do not know but that the Federal Reserve Board made a mistake the other day in precipitately announcing what it was going to do instead of fixing a time, say 10 or 20 days hence, when it would have something definitely to say about putting a stop to certain kinds of speculation.

I can see that there was room for underhand work and trickery in that sort of thing, because if anybody had inside information that the board was going to make the statement it did make, he or they could have gone back to New York and got on the bear side of stocks, and he could have made millions the next day, because the statement broke the price of stocks on the exchange $2,000,000,000 in a single day—think of that; twice the value of the American cotton crop at the present price—snuffed out in the twinkling of an eye.

The people who had been lured into this gambling den from all over this Nation were supporting the bull side, and supporting it strongly, and if it is legitimate business, they had a right to do it, but they should not have been knocked in the head with a maul until they had time to get from under. I can see what the Senator from South Carolina is driving at, that the Federal Reserve Board, if they wanted to, could have given some one advance notice of what they were about to do. That is what I accused Governor Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, of doing in 1920, of being in with the speculative interests, and telling them in advance that he was going to bring about a deflation panic, and they prepared themselves and got on the bear side of cotton and grain and stocks, and when the board caused deflation they made a killing, millions and hundreds of millions, and they destroyed agriculture and the cattle industry in the South and West.

Mr. SMITH. The question I desired to ask the Senator was this: Does he think Congress has the right to delegate to any body of men power over the commercial, financial, and industrial life of America, as it has been demonstrated now twice in the short life of the Federal reserve system, that they have done? They destroyed agriculture in 1920, and now they have wiped out—through speculation, if you choose to call it that—thousands in one day.

I call the attention of my friend from Alabama to the unspeakable danger of our delegating to any set of men the right to say who shall have credit and who shall not have credit, what is legitimate speculation and what is not legitimate speculation. It does not lie in the mouth of any man to say that thing. Yet here we are, because a great orgy of gambling is going on, if we choose to call it that, saying that we will invoke a Frankenstein to ultimately destroy everything when we are trying to destroy that thing itself.

Mr. HEFLIN. I see what the Senator means, and he and I are close together on the proposition. I do not know but what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] is right, that we ought to fix the rediscount rate and take away from the Federal Reserve Board the power to put that rate up or down at will. The Senator will recall the deflation arrangement which they brought about by an act of Congress when Governor Harding got some legislation through by fraud and deception, when he told the Senator from South Carolina, among others, that he wanted authority for using that progressive interest rate so that he could apply it only to gambling places like New York that were getting too much money. He wanted it, so he said, so that the money could go out in the channels of business in the South and West. But it so turned out that he never invoked it in New York at all, but he did apply it in the South and West and practically destroyed all kinds of business in both sections.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will recall, not only did he not invoke it in those concentrating places where the complaints came from, but the result was as the Senator has stated. I had in my desk at the time, and I am sure I still have in my files, statements showing that in some rural communities they actually charged as high as 87½ per cent for a loan.

Mr. HEFLIN. They did that in my State at Abbeville. I brought that matter before the Senate and showed the papers sent to me by the governor of the Federal Reserve Bank at Atlanta, showing that the progressive interest rate was applied to a little bank in my State at Abbeville and reached the enormous figure of 87½ per cent. What was that little bank doing? It was advancing money to the cotton grower and trying to help him hold his cotton until he could get a price that would yield a profit, and it was being punished and beaten over the head by this extraordinary action of the Federal Reserve Board.

It might be a good idea for Congress to say by law how the rediscount rate shall operate—that under certain circumstances it may be permitted to go up to a certain point or down to a certain point. Let Congress say what shall be done. But we have a board there now, which, if it wanted to, could permit one set of gamblers to go in and run up prices on the stock market and get it up where they wanted it to go, all the while getting all the money they wanted under a low discount rate, and then they could abruptly put the rediscount rate up and shut off the others who were supporting the market, and have a killing and kill off all the little fellows, and thus play into the hands of this other set of gamblers. That is possible.

In the resolution which I introduced the other day I had a certain idea in mind, but a good many Senators did not understand all that I had in my mind back of what I said in the resolution. I wanted the board to tell us what the evil complained of was and what the board considered legitimate as distinguished from illegitimate speculation. That is not all I wanted. I have my own opinion about what is going on and about what should be done in the matter. I wanted the board to state in writing their views about it, and that is what I expect them to do when they send their report here in response to the request contained in my resolution.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama will permit me, I want to call attention to the fact that there is never any complaint when the prices are down in the dust. The only action taken is to break high prices or to break corners, as they call them.

May I call the Senator's further attention to this further fact? I have some Government reports here. On August 2, 1926, cotton was quoted at 17.70. On November 2, 1926, it was quoted at 12.73. Here is another thing showing how they stabilize cotton conditions: On the 10th of June, 1926, cotton opened at 17.28. On the next day it closed at 16.34.

Mr. HEFLIN. That meant a loss of $5 a bale.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and there was not a bale of cotton made on that day. There was not any cotton in the market, but they manipulated the market. If we had had a 14,000,000-bale cotton crop, that would have meant $70,000,000 loss in value on cotton from one day to the next between seasons.

Mr. HEFLIN. Watch the scale up and down in the rediscount rate. Let them lower the rediscount rate, and you will see the price of farm products advance immediately, with the prices of other things the producers have to sell. But watch them when they apply the clamps to it and raise the rediscount rate. There will be then the opposite effect, and prices go down. So it is a barometer that tells just how the thing is going, and it has been placed in the hands of four or five men on this board. It is a dangerous power, Senators. I want the Senator from South Carolina, who has always been the friend of the farmer and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], and others from the South and West who have given thought to the question, to join with me and others and see if we can not work out an amendment to the Federal reserve law which will stop this wholesale slaughter of the business of farmers, merchants, and others in the South and West.

Mr. SMITH. Does not the Senator think that the world at large considers money a commercial commodity? Of course, the law of supply and demand as to any one product is going to affect it ultimately, and it does affect the price, though perhaps not absolutely. The converse is absolutely true, that the demand is controlled by the ability to satisfy that demand. Therefore, if money is plentiful there may be a great demand, and if money is scarce there is a less demand. Does the Senator think that we are justified in taking money out of the category of commercial articles and putting it into the hands of a few men to determine whether it shall be bountiful or whether it shall be scarce, and directly—not indirectly, but directly—affecting and controlling the law of supply and demand of the actual articles in the market place?

That is what we have done by the Federal reserve act, and that is what ought to be repealed. We ought to make the rediscount rate answerable to the law of supply and demand. When a man goes to a banker with legitimate security, what right has the banker to question what he is going to do with the currency which he has secured by a deposit of adequate security? We have destroyed the very foundation of our Government when we turn over to any body of men the right to determine what an individual shall do with his own property.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator is right. How would this do? Suppose we provide that the rediscount rate shall not be raised until the board confers with the commissioners of agriculture in every State in the Union and until notice shall have been given to business generally for so many days in advance.

Mr. SMITH. And the reasons given.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; and give the reasons for doing it, so the public will be apprised of what is going to be done. Who knew this board the other day was going to break out at daylight and make an announcement that broke the market to pieces and caused a loss of $2,000,000,000 in stocks in a day? Senators, that is a tremendous transaction. The Federal Reserve Board ought to take all classes of business, capital, and labor into its confidence and let them know what they are doing and why they are doing it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Apropos of the suggestion made by the Senator from South Carolina I am inclined to think that upon mature reflection he would desire to modify it, and I do not think that my friend from Alabama upon mature reflection would be willing to assent to it in all its implications.

I agree with the Senator, if I understand him correctly, that as to money, which is commercial, if I may use his expression, when a man goes to the bank and draws out his own money or goes to the bank and gets gold, exchanging something for gold, his deductions and his statements are accurate. But I do not think it can be legitimately contended that it is the duty of the Government to furnish credit to individuals for purely speculative purposes. If the Government sets up, as it has, a Federal reserve system and permits individuals to obtain credit by pledging collateral or pledging their property, I see no impropriety in the Government, where it stamps that credit with all the validity of gold dollars, before extending that credit and expanding credit, making some inquiry as to the purposes for which it is to be used.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Utah has hit the vital point in the proposition. The Federal reserve law itself recognized that point when it prohibited the Federal Reserve Board from rediscounting speculative loans. We are not going to be ready to have discount rates fixed by Congress unless we proceed to prohibit all banks from making speculative loans. The amendment which I offered does that in the same language that is in the Federal reserve law now.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] raised the question that we would drive business into the State banks, but we can control the State banks by denying them the use of the United States mails, which privilege we furnish, and denying them the privilege of interstate commerce unless they, too, comply with these rules. That will stop the use of credit for speculation in the United States, and then we are ready to fix the redeposit rate or rediscount rate and the general interest rate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further——

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Four years ago I offered a bill in the Senate, and I have offered it upon one or two occasions since, which denied the right of extending credit to the stock brokers for speculative purposes and to engage in marginal transactions. I saw that it was important that we forbid the Federal reserve system being used for speculative purposes. Then I supplemented that bill by another which I offered, which forbade the use of the mails of the United States for those transactions either by Federal banks or by State banks.

I do not think there is any obligation upon the Government to lend its credit for purely gambling and speculative purposes. If I go to a bank to secure credit under the Federal reserve system, offering my note with collateral which I deposit to be discounted at a regional bank, I ought to be willing to make an explanation of the purposes for which I desire to use that money, and if it is for purely speculative purposes, if it will be injurious to my country and to trade and commerce in my country, while it is a tremendous power and an abuse of the discretion might work very great evil, nevertheless it is a discretion which ought to be utilized, and the Government of the United States ought to deny that credit to me.

I suggested the other day to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] when he was speaking that I thought we ought to amend the Federal reserve law to require those who make the loans, the member banks, to charge a higher rate of interest for loans that reach the speculative category. In Great Britain they have a minimum rate of discount in their banks, but they have discretion and they use that discretion drastically at times to raise the rate of discount, and the result is that they do not have any wild speculation upon stock exchanges in Great Britain such as we have here. The Federal reserve banks have been too liberal in extending credit, and many of the State banks are using the powers which they have under their State laws to increase speculation and to contribute to the demoralization to which my friend has adverted.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Utah and I are in agreement on a good many of the things he has said.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The statement of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] in reference to the situation in Great Britain has this explanation: There is a great cooperative banking system in that country which in 1927 had a three and a half billion dollar turnover. There is no stock speculation or any other kind of speculation in that system. The cooperative capital return is fixed from the beginning. Five per cent is all it ever gets; so that stock values do not vary up and down; interest rates are steady and do not vary under that system. It has grown so great and so powerful that it has forced the Bank of England and all other business corporations in Great Britain to do business very much on the lines of the cooperative enterprise.

What the Senator has said about there being no very great variations as a result of stock speculation in Great Britain is absolutely true. The Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate had the Federal Reserve Board bring in some charts of its business, and to explain why it was that stocks fluctuated so greatly in the United States compared to other countries. They put up the charts of a dozen countries, and there were ups and downs in all of them, but finally they hung up the chart of Great Britain. When they reached the chart showing stock values in Great Britain, they moved up a little and they dropped down a little, but not so low as they started; then they went up a little again and dropped again, but never went back quite so low as previously; there was a steady, even rise, showing a healthy stabilized condition of stock values in Great Britain and also in Holland, both of which have this great cooperative system to steady them. They are the only two countries in the world that can now show charts of stabilized business.

I got those charts the other day from the New York Stock Exchange. They show a steady, even trend of business in Great Britain and Holland, whereas a chart of our stock values shows this gambling situation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. KING. In substantially everything that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] has just said I concur. I do dissent, however, somewhat from the deductions which he has drawn. I am inclined to think he is trying to have the tail wag the dog. The Bank of England and its branch banks, rather than the cooperatives, I think, dominate the situation. I admit the tremendous power and utility and great benefit of the cooperative banking system——

Mr. BROOKHART. But——

Mr. KING. Let me complete the sentence—but the Bank of England usually for a period covering 100 years has acted with great prudence and with due regard to the economic condition of the people. It has sought to prevent the orgy of speculation which, unfortunately, has characterized the United States and our banking system. The Bank of England has been conducted usually in a conservative and honest way, with a view to preventing these frightful fluctuations in matters of credit and of speculation.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I concede what the Senator from Utah has just said to be true, but one reason why the Bank of England has been so steady and so honest is because alongside of it is that great, powerful cooperative system that would be able to take its business away from it if it acted upon any other theory.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I did not intend that we should spend so much time discussing this phase of the question, but I think it has been time well spent.

In my opinion, the Federal reserve banking system is the greatest banking system ever devised, and I believe if properly administered it will meet the business needs of everybody. I think it is impossible to have a panic under the Federal reserve banking system if it be honestly administered, but the manner in which it is administered at times is hurtful, alarming, and dangerous.

Mr. BLEASE. Does the Senator believe it will ever be honestly administered?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have seen it honestly administered at times, but I have also seen some things done by it that were rather shocking to me. The system has in some instances exercised power that I hardly knew we were conferring upon it when we passed the law for its establishment. I think, however, it is an improvement over the old system.

In the old days, under the national-bank system, a national bank owning Government bonds could go to the Government and deposit those bonds, and the Government would issue money on them to the amount of their value. The banker would take that money and put it in circulation. The people of the respective communities were limited to the amount of money the national banks were willing to have in circulation.

Under the Federal reserve banking system the people who produce and who need money—the farmer, the manufacturer, the merchant, and those engaged in other enterprises of various kinds—can go to the Federal reserve bank with 40 per cent security in gold and 60 per cent in commercial paper collateral and have Federal reserve notes issued to the amount of $100,000,000 and more. So I like the Federal reserve system better than the old system. The people of the United States now have currency issued according to their business demands; they do not have to wait upon the whim of some banker who buys bonds and has money issued on those bonds and thus has a string tied to the amount of the circulating medium of the community. I repeat, it is a good system; but, Mr. President, in my judgment it has gone far afield in some of its activities, and I believe the Congress has got to do something to curb some of its activities.

As the Senator from South Carolina has said, to allow the Federal Reserve Board to say what interest rate a nation shall pay for a dollar is a great power to put in their hands. If they want to put the rate up, they can do so; and if they want to put it down, they can do so. That is a tremendous power. It is putting in the control of the few men who compose the Federal Reserve Board the very lifeblood of the business of a nation of one hundred and twenty-odd million people. It is a dangerous power; but, as I said a moment ago, when they reduce the rediscount rate the people engaged in productive activities get a better price for their produce. We are dependent upon the producing class; the world could not live without them. When the Federal Reserve Board put up the price of money, the rediscount rate, the price of what the producer has to sell goes down. You can follow it. The minute they reduce the rediscount rate you can see the prices of the commodities the masses produce gradually go up, and when they put the rediscount rate up again you can see the prices of those commodities come down.

Money is a medium of exchange and a measure of value, and the entire success of the people and their business enterprises depends on how honestly and fairly control over that circulating medium is administered.

Mr. President, I am anxious that the Senate shall begin to vote on the various proposals which have been made in connection with the pending bill. I have had in mind for some time a measure, which I want to introduce in the Senate, which would provide that no man could sell cotton in future contracts without owning it in the first place. If the farmer wanted to speculate in his cotton or wanted anybody else to speculate in it, he could register it at the county courthouse in every county in the Cotton Belt, giving his name and post-office address and the number of bales produced, and say that he was willing for his cotton to be speculated in. Then when a contract was sold it would have cotton back of it. If John Jones, a farmer in my town, who makes a hundred bales, should sell a contract for a hundred bales of cotton, every time that the contract was sold anywhere it would show that originally it was sold by a bona fide farmer, John Jones, of Lafayette, Ala., a farmer who produces on the average a hundred bales of cotton. Then we would have a contract wherever it went which would be like a deed to a piece of land, through which the title can be traced back to the original owner, the deed showing to whom the land was sold on each occasion of a sale. This cotton contract would be similar to that. Note on the margin each time the contract was sold, date, and to whom it was sold.

Not only that but I would permit the merchant to deal in it, because the merchant buys cotton from the farmer in the market places of the South. I would let a merchant who deals in a thousand bales a year speculate to that extent, because he is an actual dealer in cotton. I would permit the banker who advanced money to make the cotton and the spinner to speculate in it in a limited way as I said before. So there would be four classes who could speculate in cotton at the outset, but I would stop with them. Then, I would let anybody who wanted to buy those contracts sell them and resell them, for every time they were sold there would be cotton back of the transaction. By letting the banker, the merchant, the spinner, and the farmer sell, it might result in the transactions covering double the amount of the actual crop, but that would be ten thousand times better than the present situation, for now, with a 14,000,000 bale crop, 200,000,000 bales of dummy cotton are sold. That cotton has no more resemblance to real cotton than a mock orange has to a real orange; it is dummy stuff. Something has got to be done to stop it. They have no right to sell such stuff in unlimited quantities. And they have no right to sell the farmer's cotton on an exchange unless he gives his consent to have it sold.

Mr. President, if one goes upon the stock exchange now and undertakes to sell the shares of some company the stock of which has not been listed for such sales he can be arrested and put in jail. The owner of such stock could cry out against it and say, "My stock is not listed; it is not up for sale on the exchange; we are not permitting it to be speculated in; here is a man who has sold 100 shares of it"; and, as I said, the man who sold it could be put in jail. But speculators can go upon the grain exchange and sell the farmer's wheat when he has not listed it for speculation—when he is holding it for a better price. They use the name of his product to beat down the price of the spot wheat at home. The same thing is done in the case of the cotton producer who has not listed his cotton for speculative purposes, but who holds his cotton off the market. The speculators, despite that fact, sell it in unlimited quantities to beat down the price while the producer is holding it. The producer has no say about it. He is entitled to have a say, and I want to see the Congress enact legislation that will give him a say in the matter.

Why should the farmer's cotton and grain be speculated in unless he consents to have it done?

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am ready for a vote.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the pending measure because it not only has to do with cotton produced in the Southern States but also has to do with grain produced in the Middle West and the western section of the country. If the speculation that takes place on the grain exchanges and the cotton exchanges were confined simply to the men who speculate in those commodities it would not be so bad. If this process simply took money from one speculator's pocket and put it into the pocket of another speculator, I would have little complaint to make; but the fact is that the manipulations on the cotton market and the manipulations on the wheat market oftentimes force down the prices of wheat and cotton and compel the farmers to take a lower price than they would take were it not for the manipulations or speculations on the market.

Because of the hard circumstances of the average farmer, whether he be a raiser of cotton, or flax, or wheat or any other kind of grain, he is compelled, or practically compelled, to sell his product when it is harvested or threshed and ready for market, in order to get money to meet his expenses; and oftentimes a depression at that time means a great deal to the farmer. People say that a difference of 1 cent a pound on cotton amounts to little; but if there is an annual cotton crop of, say, 17,000,000 bales, which I understand is somewhere around the average cotton crop——

Mr. HEFLIN. The average crop is around 14,000,000 bales.

Mr. FRAZIER. Well, take any amount; say, 15,000,000 bales for easy figuring. One cent a pound on 15,000,000 bales would mean $75,000,000 to the cotton growers who produced that cotton. In other words, if the manipulators on the cotton exchange at the time the cotton is being put on the market force the price down 1 cent a pound, compelling the producers of that cotton to take 1 cent a pound less, it means $75,000,000 loss to the cotton producers in that season. If they force the price down 10 cents a pound, it means ten times $75,000,000, or $750,000,000 loss at that time.

During the hearings that were held on the cotton question last winter—and I happened to be a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry which was holding those hearings under the chairmanship of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]—if I recall correctly, the Senator from South Carolina himself made the statement that the manipulations of the cotton crop, I think in the one season of 1925, undoubtedly cost the cotton growers of the Southern States $500,000,000; and that was because of manipulations of the market, because of gambling, if you please, on the cotton exchanges.

The same thing is true as to wheat. In my own State we produce and sell at least 100,000,000 bushels of wheat in the average year; and while a cent a bushel does not mean so very much to the individual farmer, yet on the 100,000,000 bushels it means $1,000,000 to the farmers of my own State.

The same thing is true of the other wheat-raising States; and when the market is manipulated, as it often is, to the extent of 15 or 20 cents a bushel, it runs into a lot of money for the wheat growers and makes a great deal of difference in their profit or loss for that year.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to one thing?

Mr. FRAZIER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Right along the line that the Senator was discussing, on the 17th day of March, 1925, reports that Arthur W. Cutter was getting out of his line developed a panic in the local pit during the early session and wheat lost 14 cents for that session. In other words, just a rumor that this man, who was long in the market, was quitting cost the wheat growers 14 cents a bushel. It was not a question of the world condition; everything was just as it was before; but the mere report that a man was not going to buy caused the price of wheat to drop 14 cents a bushel.

Mr. FRAZIER. Oh, yes; some such report as that, or the report of a drought or a flood in certain grain sections, often causes the market to fluctuate a great deal.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The principal argument against this bill made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and also the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], is to the effect that speculation and gambling ought to be prohibited, but it is not safe to do it by the method prescribed in this bill, because there is nothing to take its place, and it would demoralize markets and prices generally if we should stop the use of the telegraphs and the mails in these gambling enterprises. Therefore we must go ahead with the gambling, because nothing new is set up in this bill to take its place.

In this connection I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this morning the author of the bill amended the bill so that it will not take effect for a year after being signed by the President. If we should enact this bill, does not the Senator think that during that year we would have the strongest incentive and reason for setting up this machinery to give the farmer a proper marketing of his crops?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I think that is absolutely true. While it is claimed that there is an excuse for voting against this bill because of so-called legitimate hedging, and that at the present time no machinery is ready to take the place of the cotton exchanges and grain exchanges if this bill should pass, I think the amendment referred to by the Senator from Iowa will absolutely take care of the situation.

One thing is certain, Mr. President: We need a change in our grain and cotton markets; and even if these exchanges should be entirely done away with, I believe the situation would be much better than it is at the present time.

Ordinarily, these speculators manipulate the market when the farmer's products are being sold, forcing the market down and compelling the producer to take a lower price for his products. Then, after the bulk of those crops—cotton or wheat or other grains—is on the market, these same manipulators change from bears to bulls and force the market up, and compel the ultimate consumers of the products to pay a higher price. It works both ways, to the detriment of the consumers and to the detriment of the producers of those products.

Besides that, Mr. President, there are thousands of little speculators who, in one way or another, are lured into this gambling game under this process, and lose their money in what is known as playing the market; and a great deal of money is lost in that way by small speculators. In fact, by various means these small speculators are gotten into playing the market, and almost always they lose out, because they do not know the game as compared with the big fellows who are there professionally, and there to make money.

In this discussion on the floor of the Senate some comparison has been made of gambling places like Monte Carlo, and other places of that sort, with these grain and cotton exchanges. In my estimation, Mr. President, Monte Carlo, with all its gambling devices, is like a Sunday school resort as compared with the great cotton exchanges and grain exchanges and stock markets.

I think in most of the gambling places like Monte Carlo, from what I have read and heard of them, there is some limit to the extent to which the gambler can go; but on the stock exchange and the grain and cotton exchanges the sky is the limit. The gamblers can go just as far as they have money to go. When a man bets on a pony race or a horse race or on the whirl of a roulette wheel he stands some little chance of winning once in a while, but when the ordinary citizen bets on the market he has mighty little chance of even getting his money back.

The opposition to this bill has tried to justify the cotton and grain exchanges on the ground that their business is a legitimate one, a legitimate protection to purchases and sales of actual commodities. I think as a general rule the amount of actual cotton or wheat sold on the market is only about 5 per cent, or at least a very small percentage, of the total amount that is traded on the market during the year. In other words, 95 per cent of the purchases and sales of wheat on the grain exchanges are pure speculation. It has been shown that in some years—ordinarily, I think—where one bushel of actual wheat is sold on the Chicago Board of Trade, there are 400 bushels of speculative wheat sold; in other words, that it is a gambling proposition instead of a legitimate primary market. Perhaps when these grain exchanges and cotton exchanges were originally established the intention was that they should be honest grain and cotton markets for the handling of cash wheat and spot cotton; but, like many other things, they have gotten away from what they were intended to be and have become gambling institutions almost pure and simple.

Of course, on these exchanges, the brokers get commissions for handling the actual wheat or the actual cotton; but the amount of money taken in by the grain exchanges and cotton exchanges as commissions for handling the actual product is mighty small as compared with their commissions on handling the future trades or the gambling end of the situation.

The Federal Trade Commission has made examinations of this subject, and its reports condemn the speculative feature of the grain exchanges. Reports from the Agricultural Department and other Government reports by actual figures of transactions demonstrate that the speculative feature is so overwhelmingly dominant as to make these places nothing more than gambling houses.

In the fall of 1925, according to Government reports, in four months the cotton exchanges sold six times the amount of all the cotton raised in the United States in that year. In the wheat market there was even a greater disparity in the buying and selling than in the cotton market. The Chicago Board of Trade ordinarily handles about 50,000,000 bushels of wheat a year. It is not at all uncommon to have from 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels of wheat bought and sold on the Chicago Board of Trade in one day, although they only handle 50,000,000 bushels of actual wheat in the whole year.

Last year, according to the best figures obtainable, a total of 20,000,000,000 bushels of wheat were bought and sold on the Chicago Board of Trade, on a ratio of about 400 to 1.

It seems to me that the real purpose of these cotton and grain exchanges is for speculation rather than the handling of the farmers' products. It is claimed by the opposition to this bill that they are absolutely necessary in order that cash sales of the real product may be protected by hedging. They go so far as to call this process of hedging in the future market an insurance protection.

The real situation is this: The speculations in the future market, both in wheat and cotton, are the cause of the fluctuations in the market, and the fluctuations in the market are the only excuse for the hedging. The only need for hedging is because the market might go up or down before the commodity can be shipped from the place where it is grown and first sold to the market. In other words, under the present system, in order to protect your sale or purchase, it is necessary to hedge under the same system that makes it necessary that a hedge should be taken out at all. You hedge with the same people who cause the market to fluctuate up and down and make it necessary to hedge, and under that system the hedging is practically little or no security.

It seems to me that no one can logically argue, in opposition to this bill, that it is necessary, because of that danger, to hedge. It is true that some new machinery might have to be put up to handle the sales, if this measure is passed, but a year's time would be quite long enough to set up new machinery to handle those hedges. If our grain and cotton markets could be stabilized, as they should be, there would be no need of hedging either in cotton or in grain.

When the price of wheat goes up or down 2 or 3 or even 10 or 20 cents a bushel, it makes no difference in the cost of the bread that is made from that wheat. The people here in Washington pay their 9 cents a pound loaf for bread whether wheat is a dollar a bushel or $1.50 a bushel, and the same, I think, is true as to cotton. An advance of a few cents on a pound of cotton to the producer of cotton makes little or no difference in the cost which the consumer is compelled to pay for the manufactured cotton goods.

In regard to hedging, it has been found by actual figures time after time that in the event of what is known as a wild market, where the fluctuations are called violent, the prices going up and down several cents either way in a day or two, the hedging becomes nothing more nor less than a joke. The Federal Trade Commission, in their report along this very line, make this statement:

> An actual study of transactions disclosed the fact that at times hedging proves to be not a protection but is the cause of losses, occasionally quite heavy. Therefore, in any event, the use of the word "insurance" to describe the device is not warranted.

That is from the report of the Federal Trade Commission in 1926, I think.

The fluctuating market is what makes hedging necessary, and during the periods when there are the greatest fluctuations and the most need for hedging, hedging is absolutely unsafe and unsound, and oftentimes causes a loss instead of a gain.

The Federal Trade Commission investigation was made because of a rapid advance in the price of wheat of about 86 cents a bushel in a few months' time back in 1925. Then, a few months later, the price fell back again 69 cents in the course of about three months. Those fluctuations in prices could not be explained by legitimate changes in wheat values, or by the law of supply and demand for the actual commodity. It was a case of manipulation of the market.

The Federal Trade Commission made an investigation of those changes in prices, and the substance of their report was that they were due to a manipulation of the market.

That investigation of the Chicago Board of Trade by the Federal Trade Commission brought out the fact that eight individuals on that exchange ordinarily traded about 2,000,000 bushels of grain each year, and that the price changes of wheat during the period of the investigation corresponded closely with the future purchases and sales of this group of big speculators. In other words, these eight gamblers in wheat on the Chicago Board of Trade actually manipulated the market up and down at their will by buying or selling of futures in large amount.

The investigation brought out the fact that the price was manipulated in one day from 7 to 12 cents on a bushel of grain during this period. It showed that in a 33-day period in 1926, when these speculators were manipulating on the Chicago Board of Trade at the rate of some 2,000,000 bushels apiece, during 30 of the 33 days the price of May wheat moved in the same direction as the net purchases or sales of this little group of eight speculators.

They also played on both sides of the market. The Federal Trade Commission report shows, and the figures bear out the statement, that some of the big speculators changed in a month's time on each side of the market, made eight changes in one month's time. In other words, one day they would be bulls on the market and the next day they would be bears on the market, or perhaps would not change quite as often as that, but in a few days' time at least. When they found that it was to their advantage to have wheat go up, they forced it up; and when it was to their advantage for it to go down, they forced it down. Such operations can only be termed destructive. These traders, as I have said, changed their positions on the market from day to day.

The Caraway bill, if adopted, would put a stop to this element of gambling that makes it absolutely impossible for the law of supply and demand to function; and makes it absolutely impossible to have anything like a stable market for wheat or cotton.

During the investigation of the cotton industry of which I have spoken, a year ago this winter, by the Subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, it was shown that the War Finance Corporation loaned one big company that handled cotton something like $10,000,000. From the investigation it developed that that money was used, first, to depress the cotton market; and then virtually to corner the 1925 cotton crop and force the consumer to pay a higher price for his cotton. That is just another example of how the manipulators of the market force the cotton grower, the producer, the farmer who does the work and produced the cotton, to take a low price; and afterwards, by manipulating the price again, compel the ultimate consumer of the cotton goods to pay a higher price for the product. Most any market would be better for the farmer than this gambler's market.

Time and again the grain exchanges and cotton exchanges have admitted that they can control the market, and they have passed resolutions from time to time, or adopted by-laws, in an effort to protect their own people from exorbitant losses. When the market fluctuates more than a certain number of points either way, they have a board of fair trade, I think they call it, with authority to declare that there is an emergency, and stop dealing for the balance of that day in the particular product that has broken either up or down more than so many points that day. In that way they save their own people from losing too much money in any one day. They give them a chance, in other words, to cover between the time they close the market on one day and the time it opens on the next day. They protect their own men.

Mr. President, if the gamblers in wheat and cotton will admit that they can control the price at one time by manipulation, it must be true that they can control it at almost any other time. When twenty or thirty million people who depend upon agriculture for their livelihood are forced to sell their products on the market for whatever price these manipulators are willing to give them it seems to me, in view of the condition of the farmers throughout the Nation, that it is high time for the Congress to take action to change the marketing system. In other words, in my opinion it is high time for the Congress to cut out the gambling element in the grain exchanges and cotton exchanges, and give the farmer a better price for his product, and see that the finished products of the grain and the cotton are sold at lower prices to the consumer by eliminating this gambling feature.

I want to refer to an article published in the Topeka Daily Capital, of Topeka, Kans., which is a paper published, I think, by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER]. It is under the date of October 7, 1928, and it says:

Grain market overborne by fictitious wheat.

Speculators last July added over 50,000,000 "paper" bushels at peak of crop movement.

In other words, last July, when the wheat from Oklahoma and Kansas was going on the market, the gamblers on the wheat market sold short over 50,000,000 paper bushels of wheat. That had the same effect on the market as if 50,000,000 additional bushels of wheat had been dumped on the market during that month. What was the result? The result was that the price of wheat was forced down during that time over 20 cents a bushel, and that the farmers of Kansas and Oklahoma who sold their wheat at that time took their loss, and the bulk of them were forced to sell at that time because of their financial condition during the past few years especially. They were compelled to take a loss of 20 cents a bushel because gamblers on the wheat market sold 50,000,000 imaginary bushels of wheat. The farmer down there in Kansas or in Oklahoma that shipped his wheat to Kansas City to sell in the grain exchange, his actual wheat, out of which flour was to be made, had to compete with the gambler, or the crowd of gamblers, who offered for sale over 50,000,000 bushels of imaginary wheat, and the price of the actual wheat was based on the price of the futures, as set by the amount of futures that were sold at that time. The gamblers sold short in order to force the market down, and after the bulk of the wheat was on the market, they began to go on the other side, and forced the market up.

Mr. President, the farmer who produces the actual wheat, the farmer who raises the actual cotton, has mighty little chance in a market which is controlled by the professional gamblers who have made a business of it for years and years and who have plenty of money to back their dealings, and who, by selling short or long, manipulate the market. I have been on the floor of an exchange and have seen the action in the wheat pit. I have never happened to visit a cotton exchange, but I am told it is practically the same thing.

We in North Dakota claim that we raise the best wheat produced anywhere in the world—wheat that will make the best flour and the most of it, according to the number of pounds of wheat, of any that is produced anywhere in the world. It is the kind of wheat the millers must have to mix with the so-called soft winter wheat in order to make a good grade of flour. The farmer ships directly to some commission firm, or sells to a local elevator which ships to the commission firm, so it amounts to the same thing. The carload of wheat is sampled by Government officials and is graded by Government officials. Yes; we have what is known as the United States grain standards act, but it is like the measures which the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] spoke of the other day which were enacted for the benefit of the farmer. The United States grain grading act was supposed to be for the benefit of the farmer, to raise the grades of wheat; but, like the other so-called farm-relief measures mentioned by the junior Senator from South Carolina the other day, it did not work out for the benefit of the farmer. The United States grain standards act works for the benefit of the millers and grain buyers instead of for the benefit of the farmer.

Because there happen to be a few kernels of buckwheat or kinghead or some other foreign material in our wheat, they call it inseparable matter, and the wheat is graded down accordingly. But after it goes down to the grain buyers and the grain men, they clean out that so-called inseparable matter and sell the wheat on the basis of a higher grading. Not only that, but they sell for a good price the so-called inseparable matter which has been taken out. They sell it for screenings to feed the sheep and other livestock produced in that section of the country. The farmers of North Dakota, the farmers of Kansas, Oklahoma, and other States which raise wheat, are penalized because of a little foul material in the wheat. Not only that, but that wheat is shipped to the market, wherever it may be, and the farmer pays the freight on that foreign material or screenings, and after the freight is paid to the grain market it is given to the grain combine, and the grain men sell it and make a profit on it. I do not know what the dockage is on cotton, but I presume they have some method of docking which generally means the same thing to the cotton growers.

I want to quote further from the article which appeared in the Topeka Daily Capital. It has been stated on the floor in the argument that because of these speculative purchases a better market is furnished and the market is stimulated. This article refers to that phase of the question and then says:

But how about the total of fifty to sixty million bushels of short sales? Those transactions had the same effect as if the wheat crop had been increased that much.

One more quotation is made from one of the grain men of Chicago, and the writer makes fun of the statement the grain man made, and I think the writer of the article is absolutely correct. He goes on to tell about the Government report in regard to grain exchanges and the grain futures administration under the Agricultural Department in their report back in 1926, and then says:

Administrator hits gamblers. There were 71 days on which one or more persons either bought or sold net 2,000,000 bushels or more. In 82 per cent of the cases prices moved in accordance with these heavy purchases or sales.

In 82 per cent of the cases, mind you.

There were several days on which the trading by a single individual amounted to more than 10 per cent of the total day's business in the dominant future. At one time two traders held over 30 per cent of the aggregate of open commitments in the dominant future, which at that time was the December. This was at a time when wheat was moving freely from the farms. You will naturally conclude, as we have always been taught to believe, that these two traders were supporting the market and thereby rendering a valuable service to agriculture.

But, Mr. President, when they sell 50,000,000 or 60,000,000 bushels short when the wheat is moving, it means that just that much more burden is placed upon the people who produce the wheat, and it forces the price down.

The writer concludes his article in these words:

Speculators carrying the load—

That is what they claim they do, you know—

"Speculators carrying the load during the period of heaviest marketing" sounds well, but except in years of extreme crop shortage the professionals will be found riding easily on top of the load.

With their 50,000,000 or 60,000,000 bushels of imaginary wheat sold short.

Mr. President, it has been stated that we have in most of the States of the Union and the District of Columbia laws against gambling, against gambling devices, against gambling with dice and poker chips, or anything of that kind. Yet, in my estimation, the ordinary everyday gambler who rolls his dice or plays with a pack of cards is a mere piker as compared with the professional gamblers who sell the very staff of life, who buy and sell wheat, who buy and sell cotton, and who thus determine not only what the producers of those products shall receive but who determine in effect what the consumers shall pay.

I know there is little use to talk on the proposition. I understand that a poll has been made, and it is all "cut and dried" that the bill can not possibly pass. But, Mr. President, it seems just a little strange to me how the Members of this body, who are supposed to be and are, of course, interested in the welfare of the farmer, can excuse themselves and salve their consciences if they vote against this measure and thus vote to protect the gamblers in wheat and cotton and other products as against the welfare of the farmers who produce those products. If it is wrong to gamble in the ordinary sense of the word, it is a thousand times worse to gamble in food products.

Mr. President, there has been a lot of propaganda spread against the bill. Yes, there are grain men in the city to-day who have been here for weeks lobbying against the bill. They have had farmers' elevators and cooperative elevators, and, I suppose, some of the cooperative cotton associations in the South, wiring and writing in protesting against the passage of the bill. Of course, the situation is that the farmers' elevator or the cooperative elevator in my State or in Kansas or Montana or Minnesota is forced generally under existing conditions to go to some big commission firm for the money to finance their operations, so the big commission companies which finance the little farmers' elevator out in the country town has asked the little elevator man to wire in here and protest against the passage of the bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKHART. Upon that proposition the amendment which has been made to the bill, providing that it shall not take effect for one year, gives us plenty of time, through our farm bill which we will have up in the extra session, to provide a way to finance the little elevators and take care of them so they need have no fear of the financial autocrats who are dictating their policies to them now.

Mr. FRAZIER. That is very true; but, in my opinion, there would be no danger, at any rate. There would be machinery set up very quickly to handle the cotton and the wheat if the bill should be passed. The brokers want that business, and if they can not make more than their legitimate commission in handling the real cash wheat and the spot cotton, they will take that legitimate commission rather than not take anything at all.

I remember one time in my State I was talking on this subject, and some man who lived in the city made the statement, "There are hundreds and hundreds of these commission men who are making their living by handling the farmers' products, buying and selling wheat and other products. What will happen to them if you stabilize the price and put them out of business?" I said, "I would not be at all sorry if they were compelled to put on overalls and go to work and earn an honest living, the same as the farmer and the ordinary every-day worker." These great commission men, this great wheat combine and milling trust, the great cotton buyers' organization, and the bond and stock buyers are the ones who are particularly wealthy and particularly prosperous at this time. There is where the only prosperity exists in the United States in these recent years during which we have been hearing so much about prosperity. They are the speculators in the market. It has not been the honest producers who have made the money; it has been the speculators.

Of course, those same speculators who make their easy money on the cotton exchange in New York City or New Orleans, or some other cotton exchange, or in the stock market in Wall Street or on the grain exchange or Board of Trade of Chicago, Minneapolis, Duluth, Superior, or Kansas City, are the gentlemen who put up the bulk of the money in campaign times to elect their party's politicians to office. I am not saying that that fact is influencing any vote on this question, but I can not see how anyone interested in the welfare of the farmers of his State or of the United States can possibly vote against the bill with a clear conscience, because its defeat will mean that the farmers can never have anything like a decent or fair or honest marketing condition as long as the gamblers manipulate the prices. So long as those gamblers fix the price that the farmer will receive for his wheat and his cotton, just so long will the farmers be going broke and be driven out of business by the thousands, as they have been doing the past two or three years. How anyone can salve his conscience by arguing that because a man invests in an imaginary 100,000,000 bushels of wheat or in an imaginary 1,000 or 10,000 bales of cotton and gambles in that way, he is doing a legitimate business as compared with the man who in some alley is rolling a pair of dice and gambling for a few dimes or a few pennies, is more than I can understand.

If this gentlemanly kind of gambling is legitimate, and the ordinary every-day form of gambling is all wrong, then there is something radically wrong with my reasoning; that is all.

Mr. President, I have no desire to delay the vote on the pending bill. As I have already said, I think this is all cut and dried and has been for a long time. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] said the other day, in discussing this question, that this measure or similar measures of this kind had been presented here for the last 50 years; that they had always been defeated; and that this one will now be defeated. I presume it will be, but notwithstanding, Mr. President, it seems to me that the fight has got to go on, and that the character of the market has got to be changed if we are ever going to have a square deal for the agricultural classes who produce these products from the ground for the benefit of all the people of the Nation. We are allowing this system to go on—to the benefit of a few wealthy gamblers and to the detriment of the twenty-five or thirty million people who raise these products from the soil.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I can not understand the reasoning of anyone who thinks that gambling in farm products helps the producer. Not only that, but one of the largest cotton brokers in the United States, under oath, stated that hardly any of his customers dealing through his firm who had gambled in cotton and continued his operations year in and year out who had not lost money. I know that in many places in my State there are men whose fortunes have been wrecked because of their gambling in cotton futures. To my mind, gambling in buying and selling nearly 200,000,000 bales of cotton on the New York and New Orleans cotton exchanges when only 12,000,000 or 14,000,000 bales are produced by the farmers should not be tolerated. It is harmful to the producers of cotton and does good to no one else.

The measure is not everything I should like to have; there are some changes which I should like to see made in it; but I shall vote for it just as it is and the bill can be perfected in conference. I desire further to say that I can not understand how any Senator can vote against this measure who is interested in the producers of cotton or any other farm products in our country.

I hope the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] is mistaken in stating that the lobby has defeated this bill. The able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], the author of this measure, states that the greatest lobby he has ever known is here trying to defeat his measure to protect the cotton and grain growers.

Senators opposing this bill have stated that the bulls and bears who gamble in cotton futures raise the price of cotton. This statement is nonsense, as everyone knows the bears would not gamble on cotton futures at all unless they could depress the price of cotton. Anyone should know that it is not only wrong to gamble in cotton futures, but it is a great injury to the cotton farmers to allow the cotton exchanges to gamble on 10 bales of cotton for every 1 bale raised by the farmers.

Mr. President, Senators who do not live in the South and understand the deplorable condition of the cotton farmers can not understand the trying times they have had the past few years. Many cotton farmers have lost their homes and everything they possessed and it has been through no fault of theirs, for they and their families have worked hard all the time. I had hoped that after years of working on bills to help the farmer that Congress would agree on some measure of relief this session and not wait until the special session to be called by President-elect Hoover after his inauguration, March 4, but those of us who are anxious to help the farmer are told by the leaders of the Republican Party that we must wait. I have told them that the farmers can not wait much longer, and many thousands have already left their farms because they no longer could make a living.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the farm relief bill to be passed by the special session may be a real help to the farmers, as they need assistance more than anyone else.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I was glad on yesterday when the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] introduced into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a reference to the failure of certain Federal land banks out in the section of the country in which he seems to be somewhat interested. The reference will be found in the RECORD of February 12 at page 3415. The matter has previously been called to the attention of the Senate. I hardly know how long ago it was when I introduced a resolution asking for an investigation of the entire Federal land-bank system, and also a resolution asking for an investigation into the conditions of the Columbia, S. C., Federal land bank and the intermediate credit bank system. I am glad to see that there is at last an awakening on this subject, and that possibly attention will be drawn to the letter introduced by the Senator from Montana and his remark, to wit:

> The information was startling in character to me.

I hope, Mr. President, that some of the other Senators will wake up to the fact that there is startling information in the letters, affidavits, and articles from newspapers which have been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for at least 12 months on this very subject.

Instead of the Federal land banks being of assistance and helping the farmers of the country, they are selling the farmers out of their property. I desire to call the attention of Senators who have not read it to an article inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on February 2, at page 2760, where the statement is made that—

> Paul A. Preus and Ofsthun were indicted here.

That was at St. Paul, Minn. Preus was a brother of the then governor of that State. The article sets out the facts, and I should like to have Senators read it. I shall read a portion of it, as follows:

> In August, 1925, Ofsthun offered to purchase from the bank for $250,000, 94 North Dakota farms it had obtained under foreclosure. With his offer he inclosed a $15,000 check as part payment. The offer was accepted, after which Ofsthun immediately assigned his interest in the farms to E. W. Backus, millionaire Minnesota lumberman.
> Meanwhile the Investment Land Corporation had been formed by Backus and Frank Thompson, widely known St. Paul politician. Ofsthun was made secretary of the corporation and Backus's interest in 91 of the 94 farms was assigned to the corporation.
> Ofsthun appraised the land for the Investment Land Corporation and was paid for his services by that company. In September, 1925, he presented a bill of $1,253.35 to the land bank for the same services. The bill was approved and paid by Preus as treasurer of the bank.
> The same month back rentals on the farms totaling nearly $23,000 were paid to the bank. In the purchase contract between the bank and the Investment Land Corporation no mention was made that a portion of this sum be paid the corporation. The indictment charges, however, that $11,853.55 of this sum was paid by the bank to Ofsthun at the direction of Preus,

Several foreclosed farms then were sold by the bank through sources other than the land corporation, although Ofsthun was paid $2,274 by the bank as commission for selling them.

Early in 1926 the Midwest Farms Corporation was formed by the Backus-Thompson interests to purchase more foreclosed farms from the bank. Ofsthun, already secretary of the Investment Land Corporation, also became an employee of the new company.

In February, 1926, Ofsthun offered the bank $250,000 for 106 foreclosed farms. Soon after this the Midwest Farms Corporation offered the bank $275,000 for the same farms, and the offer was accepted. Ofsthun then informed Preus that he (Ofsthun) was entitled to $25,000 as commission on the deal.

This transaction was followed by the sale by the bank of 24,000 acres—of foreclosed land, valued at several hundred thousand dollars. Ofsthun then presented a bill to the bank of $12,447.60 in commission he asserted he was entitled to in the sale of the 24,000 acres.

Mr. President, I shall not continue to read further. I simply read that much from the article, which is already in the RECORD, in order to show exactly what these banks are doing. In South Carolina—and I do not say this because it has to do with my own State, for it seems that the same practices are going on in other States—in South Carolina the Federal farm land bank is furnishing farmers and running farms in competition with the farmer who is there tilling the soil; that is, the bank has actually, Mr. President, put the United States Government in the business of farming. Here [indicating] are the letters; here [indicating] is the proof. We say we do not want the Government to engage in business; we say that we do not want the Government to compete with honest people who are trying to make a living; and yet these banks, foreclosing mortgages of farmers who are not able to take care of them, are then putting others in charge of those farms as overseers for the Government. Mark you, Mr. President, the banks are not renting out the farms, and taking their chances on collecting the rental for them, but they are actually putting men in charge of the farms and furnishing those men money in order that they may become farmers for the Federal Government in competition with the little fellow who is trying to make an honest living for himself and his family.

In the county of Beaufort, in South Carolina—a county which has progressed wonderfully in the last few years—the people deserve great credit for the forward stride they have made in truck farming and other industries. Now comes the Government of the United States and says to those people, "We have foreclosed mortgages in your county over thousands of acres of land. We are going to raise truck; we are going to farm on our own responsibility in direct competition against you people. We put these lands on the block. You were not able to buy them. Your interest had eaten you up. The cost of this foreclosure, lawyers' fees, and other court fees, has been very high. We"—who are "we"? The Government of the United States, through its agents, the Federal land bank and the intermediate credit bank—"we have bought these farms in at a low price because conditions were such that you could not buy them back yourself or get any one else to purchase them for you; and now we, the Government of this Nation, the officers of this Nation, are going to use them and run them in competition with those farmers who are left."

What are they doing, Mr. President? A farmer out in the country has his wife, maybe one boy, maybe five boys, sometimes probably more. You sell that farmer's land, and what do you do? You are driving one, five, or more boys off the farm into the cotton mill or into some other kind of work. If you let that man stay on the farm, his children are reared on the farm. His daughters love the farm. His boys love the farm. "That is where daddy was. That is where mother was. That is our old home." They will stay there. Some of them, at least, will become farmers. Some of those girls will marry boys who are farmers; and you build up the farm, you strengthen the farm, by keeping people on it who do not know anything else and who love that class of work.

But when the Government comes in, through its agents, and sells that man's farm, it destroys his children as farmers. It destroys that love of the farm home. They move, of necessity, into the town, and probably go into the cotton mill, or possibly into some other kind of work; but those boys and girls are forever lost to the farming interest of this country. I ask you, Senators, are they entitled to any consideration?

I know men in this body who to-day own the old homestead. I wish I had been able, when I was a young man, to buy my father's home when it was sold. They love that old home. Some of them have their children living on it to-day. Some of you very Senators take your salaries as Senators and put them on your farms, when you could possibly sell those farms, get off them, and make conditions better for yourselves; but you say, "That is daddy's old home. That is where mother lived." The old place is sacred, and some of the Senators in this Chamber now are spending money to keep it running. I am looking now at one Senator who has spent thousands of dollars to keep his boy on the old farm, and I had a long talk the other day with another Senator who has done the same thing. Through all of the vicissitudes, through all of the trouble, through all of the worry, he has gone down into his pocket and made the losses good; and it is the pride of his heart this afternoon that he owns the farm that his grandfather lived on, that his father lived on, that he was born and reared on, and that his son lives on to-day.

Senators, that is not mere fancy. It is a serious proposition. We can not live in this country without the farmer. We have to have him. Whether we like him or not, whether we pay any attention to him or not, whether we care whether he perishes or not, we can not live without the farmer. We have to have him.

I am not talking so much for South Carolina, because, while I am no prophet, I do not believe South Carolina will be much of a farming State 25 years from to-day. We have taken from Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire, Connecticut, and other parts of this country a great deal of their capital. They are moving their cotton mills South. Just across the road from where I spend the summer, at the home owned by my wife and her two brothers, there is a cotton mill that was put there in 1838. The little post office has been known since that time, up to two or three weeks ago, as Autun. The cotton mill was known as the Autun Cotton Mill. The great La France Corporation have bought it. In the last few months they have built many houses there. They have built two new plants. They are now building another plant. They have changed the name of the little town from Autun to La France. They have named it for the big corporation that bought it. We are glad to have them. We have not any objection to the change of the name of the post office if it will better the condition of the people who are there.

In other parts of my State these manufacturers are coming. We want them all. We are glad to have them, because they are helping us. They are doing us good. They are not bringing in foreign labor, if you please. We are not bothered with foreign labor. South Carolina has less foreign blood in it than any other State in the American Union. I suppose if you should go into all of the States and make a thorough examination you would find that there is more pure, unmixed American blood in South Carolina than in any other State in the American Union. Of that we are proud. So may it remain.

We are not afraid of your cotton mills on account of the negro labor, because the negro can not work in the cotton mills. The hum of the machinery puts him to sleep. Therefore he does not come into competition with our white people in that line of work.

Some of you may think that is curious, but it is an actual fact. It has been tested. They have been tried in the cotton mills of the South, and they can not stand the swish-swash of the big machinery. As proof of it, take an engineer. If you put a colored man on an engine and let him fire it, he will stay awake all day and a good part of the night, if his duty calls him; but if you put him up on the engineer's seat and tell him to put his eyes on the rail, and that big, old engine begins to swag, in 30 minutes you will have a very quietly sleeping engineer. That is why the negro never is promoted to be an engineer on a railroad.

Therefore, I am not speaking on this question or calling attention to it because of any competition that we are afraid of, but I am calling attention to it because of the injustice that is being done the farmer boy and the farmer girl when you drive them off the farm and drive them into doing something else. Who is going to feed you? Who is going to clothe you? These big corporations may go on for a long time; Wall Street may prosper; the New Orleans Stock Exchange may make millionaires; but when you get hungry, somebody will have to go out in the field and sow wheat. When you want clothing, somebody will have to go out and plant cotton. Somebody will have to hoe that cotton when it gets up a little piece. Somebody will have to plow it out after a while, take an old mule and follow him along from daylight until dark.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment to ask him a question?

Mr. BLEASE. With pleasure.

Mr. BRUCE. I should like to know whether any negro in South Carolina has ever been given the opportunity to show whether or not he would fall asleep as a locomotive engineer?

Mr. BLEASE. Oh, yes; they have been put in cotton mills and put on the engines, and they go to sleep. If my friend does not believe it, when Congress takes a recess and he will go down home with me, I shall be delighted to have him; and I assure him that I will not put him in any desert, either. I will see that there is a splendid spring near where we are, so that he can be properly cared for, and I will feed him well, and I will demonstrate just exactly what I am stating on this floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, of course the Senator does not mean that he intends to put the Senator from Maryland behind an engine where the negro is going to go to sleep on him?

Mr. BLEASE. No; I would not do that, because I love the Senator from Maryland, and I would not deprive his State of his great service, even though they have deprived themselves of what I consider a wonderful, brilliant service in this body.

Mr. BRUCE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will consider these matters. We can not stop people from farming. We will have to have farmers. I am in favor of stopping gambling on cotton exchanges; and I want to plead guilty right now—I do not want anybody to misjudge me if I can help it—I do not know one thing about it. Now, that is honest. I was born on a farm and reared in a town. I do not know anything about farming except what I see. I do not set myself up as a farm expert; but I do know that there is something wrong. I do not know whether the Caraway bill is best or not. I do not know whose proposition is right or whose is wrong. I am trying to learn. I wish my farmers down in South Carolina would get together and wire me what to do, and I would do it; but the trouble is, they will not get together. We had the alliance in South Carolina. First we had the grange. They got into politics and busted all to pieces. Then we had the alliance. It did the same thing. But we have on this floor a man who has sat here for 20 years as a representative of the farmers of South Carolina. Whether or not they made a mistake, you can judge; but, whether it is a mistake or not, the farmers of South Carolina in 1908 and each sixth year since that time have elected to this body the senior Senator from my State [Mr. SMITH] as the direct representative of the farmers of South Carolina. How well he has performed that service I think is shown from the fact that, if God spares him his health—which I hope He will—at the end of his present term my colleague will have served in the Senate longer than any other South Carolinian has ever served, not excepting the great John C. Calhoun. I shall follow him in this matter. If I make a mistake, it is not my mistake; it is the mistake of the people of my State who have indorsed his career year after year as their direct representative upon this floor; and I will say personally that I think he has made for them a good and faithful servant.

Mr. President, I would like to see this gambling stopped. It is something that does not fool me. As I said the other day, I have never bothered with cotton futures. I might have bothered with them if I had had money enough, but if I had lost I would have been in a devil of a fix, so I decided that I had better keep what I could get by my work. But I know what occurs on these exchanges is gambling. I have seen young men in the town in which I was reared, before South Carolina drove the bucket shops out, and I have seen farmers—I could call the names of two or three who are very well-to-do men—who got to fooling around, or, as they called it, "monkeying" with the cotton bucket shops, and lost everything they had. I have never known a man yet, except a regular speculator who studied the business, and who trained for the business, who has ever been able to make anything out of it.

Our State drove out the bucket shops. As far as they could, they drove out what they thought was the evil, but they left in the city of Columbia and in some other cities places where a man can go, put up his money, and buy futures. Every day at a certain hour the Western Union telegraph offices are thrown, with their great service, into the hands of the cotton gamblers. I know that; that is not hearsay, because I once had an office right next door to a young man who could not attend to his law business because of calling up to find out what the cotton market was doing, and he did as the rest of them did, he went broke.

Those are facts, Mr. President. That is just good, hard, common-sense talk, I hope. How are you going to stop that gambling? As I say, I do not know anything about it. If I make a mistake, you will know it is through unfamiliarity with the subject. If you drive those people out, and the dealings are just between the millman and the man who sells the cotton, in what position will we be then?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLEASE. With pleasure; I am trying to learn.

Mr. FRAZIER. Under the amendment that was agreed to here on the floor to-day, if this bill is passed, a year's time will be given before it will go into effect, and within that time a system can be built up, I believe, that will take the place of this so-called future trading system, which the Senator and I call a gambling proposition in handling the farmer's products. If machinery can be built up to handle it in some other way, it seems to me it would be a great deal better than the present gambling system.

Mr. BLEASE. I agree with the Senator; that is what I am trying to get at. But I know something about the cotton-mill people, and I do not blame them altogether. They want to get cotton at just as low a price as they can get it. Suppose you get rid of the speculator and fix it so the dealing will be directly between the fellow who raises the cotton and the cotton-mill man, the manufacturer; how are you helping? That is what I would like to know.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLEASE. With pleasure.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator says that he does not blame them, that the cotton-mill people want to buy cotton at as low a price as they can.

Mr. BLEASE. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does he believe they could buy it cheaper if this bill should pass?

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have just said that I was ignorant in this matter, and I am not expressing any opinion on it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Every cotton-mill man is against this bill.

Mr. BLEASE. I think so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Could they buy cotton cheaper if it were passed or if it were defeated?

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President——

Mr. CARAWAY. They know, do they not?

Mr. BLEASE. It seems to me so; but if they are against it——

Mr. CARAWAY. If they do know conditions, and they are against this measure, it follows that they can buy cotton cheaper under the present conditions than they could if this bill were passed, can they not?

Mr. BLEASE. That might be true of buying the actual spot cotton, but how about the gambling?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not know what they can make in gambling.

Mr. BLEASE. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator starts out by saying that the mill people would buy cheaper if they could. Then why should they oppose this legislation?

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, that is something I do not know anything about. I have represented but one corporation in my life, and that was a little railroad that ran from Laurens to Columbia. It was less than 75 miles long, and every time the legislature wanted to pass any law about railroads the president would come to me and say, "Get them to exempt roads under 75 miles"; and in the house and in the senate I endeavored to do that, and I think I generally succeeded.

That is the extent of my corporation practice. I never represented a cotton mill or any other kind of a corporation. I have never been a corporation lawyer, and I suspect that that is why I am here now.

Going back to my proposition, if we can get anything better, let us have it, but do not let us jump out of the frying pan into the fire unless we know where we are jumping. That is a common, everyday expression, but that is the way I feel about it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BLEASE. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator knows somebody who is not in favor of what will be good for him, he does not want to hook up and go along with him, does he?

Mr. BLEASE. I have hooked up to a good many things I have found out I would better have left alone.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is not my question. If the Senator knows that if he travels with a certain crowd it will hurt him, he will not travel with them, will he?

Mr. BLEASE. Not very long.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, would not the declaration that the cotton-mill men are opposed to this legislation influence the Senator's action?

Mr. BLEASE. I told the Senator a while ago that I started out by discussing farm-loan banks, and just drifted into this argument. I am going to let the Senator from Arkansas and the senior Senator from my State settle that. If the senior Senator from my State makes a mistake, and I go back home and should run for reelection and they jump on me about this bill, I am going to say, "I followed the senior Senator," whom they have been voting for for 20 years.

Mr. President, I have a letter from Huntersville, W. Va., dated February 4, 1929, signed by Mr. G. M. Sharp, whose headline reads "G. M. Sharp, farmer."

I have another letter, from Mr. G. A. McDonald, M. D., Fairfield, Ill. When I first read that I thought it was from my State, because we have a Fairfield County down there. It is from G. A. McDonald, secretary-treasurer of the Golden Gate National Farm Loan Association.

I have another letter, from the Black Mingo Hunting Camp, Henry, S. C., signed by Mr. John J. Snow, jr., which sets out some remarkable facts in reference to this bank in Columbia, S. C. I am going to ask that these letters be printed along with my remarks instead of taking up the time of the Senate to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HUNTERSVILLE, W. VA., February 4, 1929.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your resolution appearing in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 28 for an investigation of the Federal farm-loan banks is commendable, and I hope you may press this to a conclusion. I have a farm loan which I have had for 10 years, and contributed 5 per cent, or $200 in stock. In these 10 years I have received three small dividends. If I write the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore about it, they say see your local association; if I ask our local association about it, he says they have to withhold dividends for this reason or that. So it is hard to get any light on the matter. Since these are farmer-owned banks, why is it that our secretary-treasurer is a nonstockholder? Why are we not entitled to a stock certificate, same as any other bank? Why do we not receive, as stockholders, some financial statement from time to time? Why is it that no farmer-owner stockholder within my knowledge ever knows how much dividend is declared each year and whether he gets the amount that is declared or not? Or is all the earnings from this stock which the farmers hold going out in overhead to a bunch of political pulls for good, fat jobs?

I hope you may get some results from your resolution.

Yours very truly,

G. M. SHARP.

FAIRFIELD, ILL., February 6, 1929.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I desire to congratulate you upon the fight you are making in behalf of the farmers, who now own practically all the stock in the Federal land banks. Much of the information you have caused to be published in the RECORD corroborates the situation here, and the history of the Farm Loan Bank of St. Louis is simply a duplication of the general trend of affairs relating to the management of these banks. I organized one of the first farm-loan associations in these parts, charter No. 540, and have been secretary-treasurer of that association ever since. It is damnable to review the chicanery by which the farmers have been deprived of the rights which the farm loan act conferred upon them in the management of their own business and investment. The farmers have absolutely nothing to do with the control or management of the farm-loan banks. The bunch of politicians who were appointed to set up these banks were no sooner established in office and hung up their hats than they began to plot to perpetuate themselves in office. Through their connivance the farmers have been deprived of every right contemplated by the founders of this great institution, which ought to be the most perfect example of farm cooperation. From its very inception it has been a 1-man system, with Judge (?) Lobdell in full control during his term as chairman of the board. The land-bank officials were simple clay in the hands of Potter Lobdell; whatever he proposed they helped put over. It looks now like the whole system would soon be on the rocks. Recently the St. Louis bank sent out notice that the present rate on loans could not be guaranteed beyond March 1, stating that the "money market" was so unfavorable that it was likely that the next issue of farm-loan bonds would have to be sold with a higher rate of interest. In case the rate is advanced, it will be of advantage to farmers through this part of the country to secure their long-time loans from other sources. Nothing I could say would likely be anything new to you, but I mention some of these things as seeming to be common in other parts. I am not looking for your resolution to meet with any favorable action at present, but want to assure you that many of the associations will appreciate the effort you are making to have this matter aired.

Yours truly,

G. A. MCDONALD,
Secretary-Treasurer Golden Gate National Farm Loan Association.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 8, 1929.

Dr. G. A. MCDONALD,
Secretary Golden Gate N. F. Loan Association, Fairfield, Ill.

DEAR DOCTOR: Senator BLEASE has your favor of the 6th instant, and the Senator appreciates your kind references to his efforts to procure an investigation of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau and the Federal land banks.

He also wishes to thank you for the information contained in your letter, and you may be assured that he purposes to press for the investigation.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

BLACK MINGO HUNTING CAMP,
Henry, S. C., February 11, 1929.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In 1926 I made application for loan through the Federal Credit Bank of Columbia, S. C., and I purchased $500 stock from the loan agency handling my papers. I paid them in full that year.

In 1927 I made application in like manner, but was required to take additional $500 stock, and I again paid them in for the advance made each year of $5,000.

Now in 1928 my application for loan was rejected, although my financial statement was better than the previous years. The reason for this was that my father's financial statement would not justify the credit risk. I realize that my father's financial statement is not as good as I would like it to be, but his statement in 1928 was identically same as it was in 1926 and 1927, and if it would warrant a loan then, it certainly would warrant one now.

The point is this—they have $1,000 of my money and refuse to loan me, when they are indebted to me.

I have always supported you, and as my Senator want you to please advise me what recourse I have.

As you know, 1928 was a bad year, and I had to pay unheard of prices for fertilizers on time. I managed to pay my debts. Am in better shape than I was in 1926. Why can't I borrow when I was forced to pay $1,000 for stock?

Any information you can secure from the above matter will certainly be appreciated.

Thanking you for your prompt attention, I am,

Your very truly,

JOHN J. SNOW, Jr.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 13, 1929.

Mr. JOHN J. SNOW, Jr.,
Black Mingo Hunting Camp, Henry, S. C.

DEAR SIR: Senator BLEASE has your letter of February 11 with reference to your transactions with the Federal Land Bank of Columbia, S. C.

In reply, I beg to advise you that yours is one of a number of complaints which have been received by the Senator as regards the methods employed by this institution.

He now has pending in the Senate several resolutions asking for a congressional investigation of the affairs of not only this bank but the entire Federal farm-loan system, and so far not a single southern Senator has raised his voice to help him. It appears to be a case of "Nero fiddling while Rome burns."

You may be assured, however, that the Senator will continue to press for the investigation and to do what he can for the relief of the farmers.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

Mr. BLEASE. I also have an article from the New Republic headed "So This Is Farm Relief," by Gertrude Mathews Shelby. I ask that it be printed also along with my remarks.

I also want to have two other articles, Doing Things for or to the Farmer, by J. P. Warbasse, editor of Cooperation, and Politicians Are All Alike as Bankers. I ask that these be printed along with my remarks.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Republic, February 13, 1929]

SO THIS IS FARM RELIEF!—THE LOAN SYSTEM'S SORRY RECORD

By Gertrude Mathews Shelby

When Mr. H. G. Wells burgeoned forth with spring, in the Saturday Evening Post, expounding the question "Has the money credit system a mind?" he described "the banking financial community" as having control without responsibility, and observed that, "it displays but slight awareness of what as a constituent organ of society it is up to. It is just working uncritically, like a born cart-horse in a cart."

An extraordinarily interesting test of this question exists in that colossal centralized credit community of ours known as the Federal farm-loan system. Now 12 years old, it boasts nineteen hundred millions of assets, and the achievement of having lowered farm-mortgage interest rates by about 2 per cent. Political optimists like President Coolidge, blandly content with vast size and extensive service, ignore—at least, publicly—this system's incidental, but important, powers of social control, the beneficial uses of which require masterly application of mind.

Economists point out that, even with rates lowered 2 per cent, farmers are paying too much for necessary financing. Our rates are higher than those available in 20 other leading countries. Our farm industry earns only about 4 per cent on its investment. It can not afford to pay 5 to 6 per cent for mortgage loans, nor for marketing loans, to say nothing of the customary 10 per cent for financing crop production where such credit is obtainable. Why, the farm organizations demand, with the world's largest rural-credit system, offering tax-exempt bonds denominated as Government instrumentalities, should farmers of the United States pay more for funds than farmers in other lands pay for loans from smaller systems?

That administration of our rural credit has not resulted in low enough interest rates is merely a first point made by critics. They complain that major social powers, carefully prepared for in drawing the farm loan act, have been abused or perverted. One of these powers looks to the prevention of unnecessary deflation of the farmers' permanent investment, his land. That section of our 3-part system for farm-loan relief, the Federal land banks, controls about 10 per cent of the total farm-mortgage business of the country. The 12 regional Federal land banks are under Government control. Nation-wide in their activities, they possess regulatory powers which extend to the authority to sustain farm-land values to an important degree.

The acid test of whether this credit community has a mind involves this point.

Encouraged by high prices and the boom methods of farm realtors, some—by no means all—of our farmers bought too much acreage at inflated postwar prices. With the failure of farm income, deflation occurred, followed by a land crisis. Bankruptcies and foreclosures were widespread and inevitable, and the tragic procession of defeated farm families began to move citywards, seeking livelihood in other occupations than those to which they had been trained. By 1924 it was a migration; then a rout. To-day we know that we suffered a net loss in farm population of 4,000,000, and still land panic is with us. Farms are still being foreclosed in numbers by mortgagors, and land prices are strikingly subnormal. The question is: Did the farm-loan system display the disposition and the intelligence to use its wide powers to sustain land values as much as possible?

Concrete acts allow ground for belief that the system exerted its powers, perhaps blindly, to the positive detriment of agriculture, for whose relief it was designed. For, somewhat casually, when deflation of farm prices was well under way, the Federal Farm Loan Board initiated a drastic policy, the significance of which—since nominally it had to do with accounting—remained obscure for several years. Presidents of the Federal land banks were advised that "acquired real estate"—foreclosed farms—must be completely charged off the books immediately after taking. Since land banks have no assets save lands, this ruling was tantamount to inflicting a rate of 100 per cent depreciation upon the business. Thereafter, for more than five years, all farms foreclosed were not listed in any value whatever as assets. The true asset value of these farms was thus concealed.

The effect of this ruling was calamitous. Like all other agencies lending on land, the Federal banks had to carry an overburden of real estate, although they were not, in most instances, so badly off as State or certain national banks, or many insurance and mortgage concerns.

An identical problem faced all alike: How to carry the land until it could be profitably sold. "Hold" was the watchword. Experts advised a private insurance company with heavy mortgage investments that to sell 5,000 acres in parcels scattered throughout Iowa at forced sale would depress farm-land prices throughout the State $25 per acre.

Commercial banks having demand obligations were soon compelled to sell. Land banks, however, were in a favored position.

Accepting no deposits, free from demand obligations, they were also fortified by the provision in the farm loan act designed to meet just such a crisis, and to allow for the cycle of industrial ups and downs: The land banks are empowered to hold land five years if necessary, and no fixed rate of depreciation is set. Generally speaking, the Federal land banks were in a good position to hold, since appraisals for the most part had been conservative. Testimony given in congressional hearings states that in Iowa, for example, $100 per acre was arbitrarily fixed as the top value that would ever be accepted as a lending basis. The Federal land bank loaned closer to 35 per cent than the legal 50 per cent of the accepted valuation.

The policy of complete, immediate depreciation of all assets, however, changed the complexion of the situation, since it deeply affected the balance sheets of many of the Federal land banks. To make a reasonably good showing the land banks of various districts had to sell. There were few buyers at any price. As tight-pressed commercial banks attempted to liquefy assets nearly all at once, a glut of land accumulated. When, regardless of market conditions, certain land banks joined the stampede and dumped land—sometimes wholesale—on a market which was already bad, prices dropped plummetwise.

The St. Paul Federal Land Bank sent to the auction block in a single batch parcels of land worth one million; the cash price received was $375,000. The transaction brought a large direct loss to the bank, but its indirect losses were worse. By depressing values the security behind every good loan was reduced not only for this bank but for all mortgage agencies. And the human loss! Farmers in no visible way related to the Federal land bank saw their equities in their farms diminish, and, in some cases, vanish. Such a process inevitably increased the migration which it was the obvious duty of the system to exert itself to check.

In the great Spokane Land Bank a serious situation was reached by 1924. Federal land banks have interlocking liability; all are responsible for the losses in any. Spokane's overburden of foreclosed lands (and unpaid taxes) alarmed the Federal board and the other 11 banks. The condition set up by law for receivership of any bank is default of interest on its bonds. This was not reached at Spokane; nevertheless, a receivership, camouflaged under the name of the Spokane Commission, was set up. To-day Spokane stockholders complain that their bank never actually required any such treatment; that had they been allowed to count their real assets at book value (farms appraised at ten millions which the bank had foreclosed), they would have worked out their problem. They complain that a large land-sales department, employing 40 people and extra officials, exerts a costly and dual control over the bank's affairs, which Spokane is required to stand because the other 11 banks furnished, up to 1928, some $2,800,000 to help Spokane out.

We lack sufficient information to test the justice of these contentions. A covering darkness has been maintained for some years over the actual contract between Spokane and the other 11 banks, about the amount of land sold, whether wholesale or retail, as well as about the prices received and the names of the purchasers. The apparent secrecy has its excuse in the probable effect on the bond market. If farmers of other districts had known that three millions of funds otherwise available for dividends to themselves were diverted to the Northwest necessarily or unnecessarily, stockholders as well as bondholders might have exerted themselves in an effort to find out whether the situation was caused and prolonged by stupidity or by design. After the fact, the information did less harm; yet it would appear that a flood of light should still be let in.

For the financial aid given Spokane taxed the resources of other banks, and the continuance of the charge-off policy even more so. To-day the Columbia, S. C., bank is said to face a more serious situation than any other. Six out of twelve of the Federals, by 1927, showed their embarrassment by cutting their dividends; four reduced, two paid none whatever. Why these facts were omitted from the 1927 annual report of the Farm Loan Board to Congress is a question of interest. For two years those annual reports of the Farm Loan Board have been oddly delayed. The 1926 report was withheld until Congress had adjourned. Finally submitted as of a May date in 1927, it was not printed for general distribution until the very last of that year. The 1927 report, due in the first quarter of 1928, was held up until the Senate finally passed a special resolution demanding it; its appearance was made on the eve of the adjournment of Congress in May. Astonishingly, that report included tables for a whole quarter of the year 1928.

Statements from this board before now have puzzled even wise members of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, usually because they were brief, consolidated, unelucidated. But why should the board have been moved to the unprecedented presentation of figures for 15 instead of 12 months? Explanation lies in the fact that in February, 1928, the 100 per cent depreciation policy on foreclosed farms was at last abandoned. The book value of many million dollars' worth of farms distinctly improved the appearance of the March statements over those of December. Revoking the policy was proper; inclusion of three months of 1928 decidedly improper. Such practices in a presidential campaign year invite damaging comment upon the board, headed by Eugene Meyer, intrusted with the supervision of $2,000,000,000 institutions, and required promptly to present unconfused facts for one year at a time to Congress and to stockholders. Query: Was the action the result merely of inadvertence?

Was the depreciation policy which, according to qualified analysts, unnecessarily embarrassed the farmers' banks, and increased instead of checking deflation, perpetuated through mere inability to use machinery properly?

Perhaps the Federal Farm Loan Board and the political appointees who officer the Federal land banks simply muddled along. Certainly the alternative is not agreeable to consider. It would imply a prolonged hostility toward the farmers' own nonprofit banks. It might entail indictments of successive Farm loan boards, of Mr. Mellon, ex-officio chairman, and of the administration. Nevertheless, the sequence of farm-loan activities is so interpreted in certain quarters. Evidence offered in connection with the long-suppressed joint-stock land bank scandals is pertinent to this theory. In 1926 the privately owned and parallel system of joint-stock banks, competing with Federals, found themselves confronted by a similar, but far less stringent, ruling of the Federal Board, requiring a charge-off of 20 per cent annually on acquired real estate, and setting aside an extra reserve. The majority fought like wild elephants. They uttered strong charges concerning old-line mortgage interests using Treasury influence to wreck the farm-loan system. They declared that this depreciation policy, not half so exacting as that which had long been in force in the Federals, would actually ruin the joint stocks, which had a much lighter burden of acquired land.

So effectively did the joint stocks protest the right of the Federal Board or the Treasury to interfere with fiscal policy—the clear prerogative of their own boards of directors—that ultimately the rules which had been formally adopted were revoked, with the approval of Mr. Mellon, without ever having been put into force.

Now, if the joint-stocks' contention that such a policy would ruin their banks is correct, it would appear that for years before and a year after the Federal Board let this branch of the system off, it consistently maintained that policy to the prejudice and actual damage of the farmers' Federal land banks. Why the discrimination between the two systems? Since early in the game, the private, profit-making joint stocks have been favored. When Congress, in its alleged wisdom, set up two parallel systems of banks to do the same work, the least that could have been expected of the supervisor, the Federal Farm Loan Board, was impartiality. Yet it appears that the farmers' own branch, for whose stock farmer stockholders have paid in sixty-one millions of hard-earned, crop-made dollars, has suffered a weighty, unseen handicap. These stockholders have never been permitted to control the boards of their own banks—and thereto appends a tale of political chicanery almost without parallel! They have been kept virtually unable even to find out what was actually being done to them. So this is farm relief!

Not unnaturally, the favored joint stocks have been able in recent years to outloan the Federals. Not unnaturally, six of the farmers' banks are less prosperous than they might be expected to be by virtue of the three billions of good lands pooled by their members, the tax exemption their bonds enjoy, and the sublime trust farmers somewhat blindly place in their government. What is remarkable is that, despite losses, because of its vast resources and the faith which has to date bred new business, the farm-loan system is still financially sound.

To make it sound in all other ways is imperative. Dangerous tendencies must be checked and legislative and administrative adjustments made. Before passing new farm-aid legislation, this Congress might well adopt means to achieve the full purposes of that hopeful Congress of 1916, which fathered the farm loan act. Those who advocated social control of banking and credit should concern themselves with fool-proofing the farm-loan credit community, and supplying it with necessary gray matter to allow its development in the superlatively important field of cooperative credit, on lines which do provide low interest, assure self-help, of which politicians can not make ducks and drakes, and prevent dangerous absent-mindedness in regard to genuine information and major policies.

DOING THINGS FOR OR TO THE FARMERS

By J. P. Warbasse, editor of Cooperation

The Danish farmers won economic independence not when they created their own cooperative organizations for buying and selling, although this was a long step. They freed themselves from the need of subsidies and philanthropic considerations when they created their own credit institutions.

FEDERAL LAND BANKS USELESS NOW

In the Federal farm loan act the farmers of this country have a tool through which they may gain control of their own credit. But the land-bank system is utterly useless unless it is controlled by the people for whose benefit it was supposed to be created. A Federal farm-loan banking system that is controlled by the great banking interests for their own benefit is neither of nor for the farmers.

GIVE FARMERS CONTROL OF LAND BANKS

Let the farmers get together to secure the control and administration of the land-bank system. If it is for them it should be by them. If they should secure control they prove that they can neither get the control nor successfully administer the system, then we shall have to acknowledge that the orators are wrong. But the farmers should have the chance. Or they must make it. There is hope that they will, if their eyes can be turned away from other people's schemes to have somebody help them, and if they learn to look to themselves for help.

DANGERS LURK AHEAD UNDER SYSTEM

If the farmers are not permitted to create and run a cooperative banking system which is the one thing needed for their salvation, the farmers will continue to lose their land. The land will be worked by a steadily increasing class of tenant and debtor farmers, until we have our farming carried on by a poor peasantry who live at the mercy of those who speculate in the products of the farmer's industry.

This is the prospect toward which this great country is moving—a country that once was rich with healthy and industrious human beings who represented the cultural as well as the greatest economic resource of the Nation, and who dwelt upon its farms where acres of waving harvests were unmortgaged.

Orators go roaring across the countryside telling the rural population that "everybody knows that the American farmer is the most intelligent farmer in the world." Well, everybody doesn't know it. The orator couldn't prove it. The farmers may by this time have heard it so much that they think it is true. There is one man at least who knows it isn't true—that is the commission merchant.

The Danish farmers showed that they were more intelligent than the American farmer when they stopped asking somebody else to help them, and went ahead to help themselves. And the American farmer will take the first steps to confirm the claims of the orators when they do the same thing.

SUBSIDIZED FARM LOAN A MENACE

The American farmer will begin to help himself most effectively when he realizes that any measure for farm relief that subsidizes the farmer and costs money damages the farmer more than it helps him. To understand this he has first got to realize that a subsidy to the agrarian interests does two things; it increases taxes and it weakens the farmers' independent power of self-help.

Anything that increases taxes hits the farmer harder than it hits any other class. All taxes, as a matter of fact, get back to the land sooner or later. Other property can be concealed from the tax collector; but you can't hide a piece of land with a couple of buildings sticking up out of the ground. It pays all that is assessed upon it, and there is no escape. The collector will have his taxes or the sheriff will have the land.

But tax the trader, the merchant, the manufacturer, or the professional worker, and every one of them adds the tax to his prices and passes it along the line to the consumer. All of these people fix the prices on what they sell. The farmer is in the unfortunate position that he does not fix the prices of what he sells; the other fellow does it for him.

The oil producer says, "I need $10,000,000 to endow a university"; and he adds half a cent to the price of gasoline for a few days, and he has the money. The farmer says, "I need $198 to put a new roof on the barn," but he can not say, "I'll put a couple of cents more on the price of wheat or raise the price of pork a half a cent." He does nothing of the kind; he lets somebody else reduce the price for him, and the roof keeps on leaking. He pays his own taxes, and most everybody else's taxes, too; and the pity is that too many farmers do not know it.

The farmers of the United States are our largest class of consumers; they pay the bills that the other fellow passes on to them. They are the largest class of landowners; they pay the direct taxes that are imposed upon them without escape.

Again there is agitation to do something for the farmers. Another bill for farm relief will be laid on the President's desk for his signature or veto.

The farmers seem to get encouragement from these measures—whether they get any help or not. It makes them feel better to think that something is being done for them. But as a matter of fact, most of these measures for farm relief would not do things for the farmers at all if they were enacted into law; they would do things to the farmers. The pity is that such a small part of the rural citizenry understand this fact.

ILLEGAL PRACTICES IN FIRST LAND-BANK DISTRICT

"If you really desire to improve the system," wrote a New Jersey secretary in the Springfield district to a Senator, "get some information from the associations and never mind politicians. Why not find out just why dividends to borrowers of this district were cut in half and the salaries of the bank officials increased $1,000 to $1,500 a year and a new expense of $25,000 for a fiscal agent created at the same time? Are those two facts related?"

LAND BANK VIOLATES LAW

Why are the banks permitted to create a fund of "undivided profits" in violation to the law?

The land bank was never intended to be a profit-making institution, as the reading of the act will plainly show, and if they now have so much profit that they have to increase salaries and to create new ones, why not some power stop them by reducing the interest on loans? (Loans have no vote.)

HOW THE LAND BANK "SOAKS" THE FARMER

Any way you turn the case the farmer is a loser. First, he pays 1 per cent commission to secure a loan, and three-eights of that has to go to the land bank and five-eighths to the association, and, as I understand the annual report, the bank received a little over $5,000 more than they spent on that three-eights, while the associations have to do their work for nothing, and even hold back dividends on shares held by borrowers to get running expenses.

POLITICIANS ARE ALL ALIKE AS BANKERS

We are having the same experiences here in Canada with political banking as you are in the United States. To illustrate, so far every Province in Canada that has entered into political farm finance has suffered enormous losses. This not because of any particular risks involved, since private institutions are making loans in the same territory and making money; they do not permit partisan politics or "pull" to enter into the making of loans. This is a contravention to the methods adopted by political appointees, who are obliged to do "favors" to their higher-ups and lower-downs in order to hold their jobs.

LIKE THE FEDERAL FARM-LOAN SYSTEM

This past year the Province of Manitoba farm-loan system, for instance, frankly acknowledges losses in operation and, furthermore, has added one-third of a million dollars to its real-estate account. This brings its real-estate holding up to 10 per cent of the total outstanding loans, a condition that would be tantamount to insolvence on the part of a private banking institution, but which is considered as only a "hardship" by the political bankers.

[Extract from a letter from a farmer borrower through Federal farm-loan system]

WHY SHOULD FARMERS BE FARMED?

Just why should our greatest basic industry continue to have a "wet nurse" named to handle its own private affairs? Just why should the Federal Farm Loan Board of the Treasury, working through their appointees in the 12 district Federal land banks, be permitted to manipulate as they please the enormous capitalization of the banks which the farmers have made possible by the payment of their hard-earned cash to establish? Why should politicians instead of financiers dominate? Why should inexperience and inefficiency, absolute dishonesty in many cases, rule banks which farmers have erected?

These are all questions which thousands of farmers are now asking themselves; they are questions which Congress must answer and answer in a patriotic instead of a political way and answer mighty soon. Otherwise Congress must needs expect to draw upon the Federal Treasury to repay to the half million borrowers through the 12 Federal land banks for the enormous losses resulting from the mismanagement of the political bankers the Harding and Coolidge administrations have run up, and which the Hoover administration will continue unless Herbert Hoover does something about making his promises more than thin vapor. If he stands against bureaucratic domination of private business as President as firmly as he stood against this un-American affair as a candidate, he will immediately set about turning these land banks over to the farmers who now own them. If, however, the Hoover administration carries out the same program as the two previous administrations, no move will be made to right the terrible injustice which the Republican Party has enforced upon American agriculture.

LARGEST INDUSTRY IS HANDLED LIKE AN INFANT

Why is it that the politicians in Washington continue to consider the American agricultural industry as an infant still struggling about in swaddling clothes? Only because they feel confident that here is one giant they can easily pluck and pillage, for no other industry of standing would tolerate for a moment, and neither the House nor Senate would consider, a proposition of asking the railroads, the banks, the manufacturers, or any other institution to capitalize an institution for the politicians to manipulate to the exclusion of the private owners. Yet this is precisely the trick these politicians played upon the half million farmers who now own the capital stock and assume all the liabilities of the 12 Federal land banks. The majority of the appointees who serve as directors are named and come under the supreme dictation of the political Farm Loan Board, and manifest only a very slight interest in the farmers who pay their salaries and stand the enormous expenses which this crookedness, inexperience, or lack of comprehension of the proper workings of a farm-loan bank involve. Thus, the Federal land-banking system, as presently constituted, stands without a parallel in human history, a gigantic enterprise owned by and operated for farmers, yet dominated by politicians, not one of whom have one penny involved in its capitalization, and not one of whom assume a cent's worth of liability.

FARMING OUR BIG BUSINESS

The real importance of the American farmer, and his industry, when compared with other industries, reveals that agriculture is by far our greatest industry. According to a survey recently made by Farm Journal, farm people now comprise 30 per cent of the country's population, and this 30 per cent owns 39.25 per cent of the total capital investment in the United States. How is it that men who are brilliant enough to have builded such a gigantic enterprise now require "wet nurse" farm-loan boards to run their business for them in common with the Indian, who has a guardian named to transact his business?

The capital invested in the country's various industries is listed as follows by the Farm Journal and classified and divided thus:

Value of farm property	$60,000,000,000
All manufacturing industries	44,325,470,000
All railroads	21,450,900,000
Mines and oil wells	8,380,000,000
Electric-light industry	7,350,000,000
Iron and steel companies	3,500,000,000
Telephone plants	3,035,000,000
National banks (capital and surplus)	2,970,074,000
Automobile industry	1,888,000,000

STRIKING CONTRAST

Although the farmer owns $60,000,000,000 of property, of which he has put up for security less than one-third, about one-twentieth of which is covered by Federal farm-loan mortgages, through the Federal land banks, Congress permits politicians to run his banks for him, while they have been most zealous in extending to the private banks every possible safeguard of their personal and private interests. However, these banks, all bunched up together, now own less than $3,000,000,000 of property, or one-twentieth the amount represented by the farmer's holdings.

The railroads, representing an investment of only slightly more than one-third that of agriculture, are operated by their own men, selected by their constituted stock-owning members, and do not have a majority of their directors, inspectors, traveling joy riders, and other officials selected by a Federal farm-loan board. That is one reason why the railroads are a success and why farming is a failure so often.

The Senate has spent hundreds of hours, and several hundred thousand dollars have been expended needlessly in printing the long-winded speeches of Senators respecting the menace of private electric power "trusts." These all bunched up represent less than $10,000,000,000 investment, while the farming industry is ten times as large. Why not spend some of that thought, energy, and brilliance in putting the farm-owned banks into the hands of the farmers who own them, instead of worrying about "trusts" that are now in the hands of those who own them? Why not start a campaign to bust some "political trusts," to give the gate to some politicians who are running the farmer's business; yes, and wrecking it, too.

Weeks have been spent considering tariff measures for the various manufacturers. These all bunched together own property valued at only two-thirds that of agriculture. Why not spend just one week in passing an act that will turn the farm-owned Federal land banks over to the farmers who own them? This would long since have been done had we been blessed with statesmen instead of politicians.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I place these things in the RECORD to show the Senate, if I can, that there is nothing personal in this fight of mine in regard to this farm-loan system or about the Columbia (S. C.) Bank.

When I came to the Senate I did not know a man connected with the Columbia Bank. If I did, I am not aware of it. I knew the ex-Congressman who was the head of the other bank. I could not have anything against these gentlemen, because I did not know them. We have one man who is president of a bank there who is not a South Carolinian. He is not going to get the sympathy and cooperation he should have, because my people are just like others; we resent people being sent from other States into my State to run our affairs. If that man is not pretty smart, we will send him to the Atlanta Penitentiary, or some other seaport just about like that. We are going to watch him, and if we can catch him, we are going to catch him. I hope he will not commit suicide, as the cashier did, and go to this other place down there.

I started this fight because of the complaints that were made from Beaufort and from other parts of my State. Then, when I started the fight on this farm-loan system in Columbia, letters like the ones I just put in the RECORD and others from all over the country began to come to me about the entire farm-loan system.

I introduced a resolution, which went to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and Mr. Eugene Meyer went before them. I had never seen him before, and I have not seen him since, and I hope I never will see him again, because God says we should love our fellow men, and if my salvation depends on my ever loving a thief like him there is no salvation for me. I have the proof right here in his own handwriting. This Meyer went before that Committee on Banking and Currency and told them that there was nothing wrong with the farm-land bank system in Columbia, S. C. He told them that there was nothing wrong with the Columbia, S. C., bank. I ask Senators how he could do that in view of the proof that I have put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the last six or eight months. How could he do that in view of the facts the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] presented to the Senate yesterday? How could he do that in view of the matter I read a few minutes ago about the bank in Minnesota, where the ex-governor's brother was so mixed up with it?

I know that the Senate is a body of honest men. We may make mistakes; we may vote differently from the way we should vote; that Senators, Republicans and Democrats, are busy, most of them here a good deal busier than I am because of their committee appointments, and they have other matters that they have to look after; but I do not believe there is a Senator in this body who sits on either side who, if he had the time to sit down and study what has been presented to the Banking and Currency Committee, would not say that this system is wrong, and that it should be corrected in some way.

The great Republican Party has four years ahead of it besides what it has had, and if you want me to be honest with you I think when that four years are up they are going to have some more terms, until the mothers who lost boys and the sweethearts who lost future husbands in the World War pass away and we have a new generation. The World War has been and is going to be the doom of the Democratic Party in this country. They promised the people to keep them out of war at the very time when they knew that there was a standing promise that if a certain man was reelected President of the United States he was going to take us into the war. You can not get over deceiving people like that. You can tell a lie to a woman you love and she will kiss you and forgive you—and God knows there is nothing on this earth like a woman's love—but you can not tell the people this thing here and show them, as a reward for it, dead bodies, fresh-made graves, and debts, and get them to keep that kind of a party in power. The party must have new leaders, new ideals, and honest methods if they wish to succeed. Surely, after so many defeats those who think that they are leaders should retire and let others come forward, and four years from now they will not win unless there are some great changes in the feelings of the people of the country.

In a speech in my State I said—and I repeat it to-day—that if we went into that war it would be so long before the Democartic Party got back into power that they would think that most of the people and God Almighty Himself had deserted them. Therefore, I say that Senators on the other side of the aisle have a responsibility on their shoulders which does not pass when they pass. When they leave this body that responsibility will not have ended. Even though their bodies be carried to the last resting place, their responsibility is not gone.

There was read here yesterday a beautiful eulogy on the life of a once President of these United States. If he could know, and possibly he does—I do not say that he does not—if he could have heard that eulogy, it would have made him as happy as he was in the heyday of his life and glory on this earth. Will such a eulogy be written of Senators of this day? What must we say to him who sees his little children going to bed at night hungry, getting up in the morning half clothed, barefooted, going out into the cold; to him who when the spring of the year comes goes with that happy heart of his, whistling and singing, back to the field that has brought him nothing the year before, following the same mule, ploughing in the same furrow, sowing the same kind of seed, trusting to God to make him happier and more prosperous in the fall to come? Senators can not pass by that responsibility lightly. It will come back to them some day. It will come home to the great Republican Party some day.

I appeal to those of the Republican Party now in charge of the Government of this country and to be in charge of it for the next four years to relieve the situation. Let somebody inquire into the banking situation and ascertain what is the trouble. Let them inquire why thousands upon thousands of acres of land are being sold on the block. Let them ascertain why this man and his wife and little children are driven from the old homestead out into the big road and out into the street. Let them see why men and women in this country this very night will go to bed hungry, while some of them will give some relief to the hungry family by giving them sweet potatoes and drinking water, the only thing they have in their homes.

Some Senators may say that is not a true statement of the situation. Let them come home to South Carolina with me to-night. I will take them into the storm-stricken area of South Carolina and I will prove it to them. You can remedy it, Senators. This great Congress of this wonderful United States can remedy it. I appeal to you to-night not in bitterness. If I had my way I would strike the word "hate" from our language and abolish it altogether. If we should abolish hate from this life, we would almost have a heaven on earth—hate, envy, jealousy. We need not be jealous. You have all of this world's goods. You have the highest position that you can hold. I am not so sure but what the position of United States Senator is a more responsible place than that of the President. He only executes the law that you make. Your responsibility is the making of the law. His responsibility is in its execution. I appeal to you not from the standpoint of a Democrat, although I am one; not because of any religious prejudice, because I have none, thank God; but I appeal to you as an American, as a Senator of these United States, to look into the banking situation and see what is wrong and quit allowing your bankers to sell the farms and turn the poor fellows out, but give them a chance and give their children a chance.

The farmer is made like us in the image of his God. He has a soul. He has the same love for his wife and little children that you have for yours. He must answer as you must answer in the great beyond. Some day you like he, while he may be in a pine box and you may be in the finest casket, must sleep the same sleep and face the same God.

And then may—with you and him—all be well.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Farrell, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16301) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13825) to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. MORIN, Mr. JAMES, and Mr. MCSWAIN were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 3771) vacating the alley between lots 16 and 17, square 1083, District of Columbia, and it was signed by the Vice President.

THE FLAG AND PATRIOTISM

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered by Col. R. B. Putnam, of the Marine Corps, at Richmond, Va., on November 11, 1928, which is a tribute to the United States flag and deals with teachings designed to develop loyalty to the flag, patriotism, and devotion to duty.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES

It is a long, long call from the middle of the fifteenth century to the present day, and it seems difficult to believe that such a thing as the trading in silks and spices of that remote past should have any relation to, or bearing upon, the signing of the armistice in the Forest of Compiegne, in France. This armistice became effective on the eleventh hour of the eleventh day of the eleventh month of the year 1918, and was the event which brought to an end that horrible cataclysm of death and destruction commonly known as the World War. It was a day of rejoicing throughout the civilized world, a day which marked the beginning of a new peace, and in celebration of which to-day, 10 years later, "we, the people of the United States," are gathering together in our various meeting places throughout the land.

But if we make even a hasty glance over the history of the past we find that silks and spices were the luxuries of the fifteenth century. The necessities were few—a bit of bread and meat, a good charger, a good suit of armor, a piece of cold steel, and a strong right arm to wield it; firearms were just coming into existence.

Note also that trading in those luxuries, silks and spices, was a source of wealth in those days even as trading in luxuries is a source of wealth to-day. The silks and spices of the fifteenth century came from the East Indies. The journey was long, hard, and tedious, one fraught with many dangers. It is not surprising, then, that men sought a shorter and more direct route to the source of their wealth.

In one way the sea gave a promise, but so many ships had sailed out of port and down beyond the horizon, never to be heard from again, that it was believed that they had sailed on until they had simply dropped off the rim of the earth in the great beyond. People of that day and age believed that the world was flat.

You will recall that in the latter part of the fifteenth century a Genoese sailor, one Christopher Columbus, advanced the astounding, and for the times, the most ridiculous theory that the world was round, and that since this was so, he could reach the East Indies by sailing due west. Laughed at and hooted at as a crazy fanatic, he plead his cause before many people of wealth and in many courts, only to meet with disappointment after disappointment. However, there could be no doubt as to his sincerity of purpose or of the earnestness of his own belief in his theory, his arguments in support of which were logical and, to many, convincing.

At last, when he had given up all hope, Queen Isabella, of Spain, espoused his cause, and since the public treasury would not support such a crazy scheme, we are told that she pledged her crown jewels to secure funds with which to fit out an expedition to be conducted by Columbus. In this his hour of deepest trial and disappointment, it was a woman who came to his aid and gave him hope and strength to carry on. So it ever has been, is to-day, and ever will be. Man in his hour of darkest doubt and deepest despondency will find through the faith of some good woman the strength to "carry on."

Be that as it may, the crown jewels were pledged, and in the year 1492, Columbus, with three pitifully small ships, set sail due west across the broad and trackless seas in search of "the east." And what a voyage it was—what fortitude and courage were required to win success. Added to the known terrors of the deep there were all of the terrors of the unknown; also the superstitious belief of ignorant men, which led them to mutiny and all but caused the cruise to end in disaster. Probably no adventure in all the history of mankind was ever undertaken against such tremendous odds by men so poorly equipped for what they had to face. Certainly no single event was ever fraught with so much meaning to the whole of the wide, wide world and the future of the human race as this, the first voyage of Columbus.

In due time, after overcoming untold obstacles, land was sighted, but it was not the East Indies of silks and spices. It proved to be a new world of inconceivable extent, and apparently of hitherto undreamed-of wealth.

Following the reports of the results of the first voyage of Columbus there came a long period of discovery and exploration, and following this a still longer period of appropriation and colonization. Here, along the mid-Atlantic shores, England gained a foothold, and from the founding of Jamestown, Virginia rapidly grew into a lusty colony. To the south were the Carolinas, Georgia, and farther south the Spaniards in Florida. To the north, in New York, the Dutch. North of them were the English again, in the bay colonies—Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, etc. Still to the north of them were the French, in Canada. Away to the Southwest, beyond the Spanish in Florida, and along the broad reaches of the Mississippi, were again the French.

The story of the growth of the Colonies is well known to all. Some men came seeking wealth, some were driven from their home country for one cause or another, some because they had been oppressed and held down almost to penal servitude, due to the fact that they did not happen to be in favor with the powers in control. Others came seeking freedom in religion; the right to worship the God that made them, according to the dictates of their own consciences. The desire for liberty of speech, of thought, and even of their very souls, drove men and women to break all the ties that bound them to their homes, to face the terrors and hardships of a life in the wilderness, beset by savages and wild beasts. But within their hearts and very souls there burned the love of liberty, of righteousness, and of peace, which eventually was to weld them into a mighty nation.

The story of the growth of the Colonies, of how the English Colonies through wars and conquest, eventually gained the supremacy in this New World is a familiar one. We all know how in time the mother country gradually became jealous of the growth of the Colonies, and through greed and avarice sought to enrich herself at their expense by levying heavy taxes, making this demand and that demand, at the same time denying the Colonies any voice in their government.

The Colonies were patient and long-suffering, and the greater their patience and fortitude the greater became the burdens which were laid upon them. "Taxation without representation" became the rule of the day and not the exception. The courts, dominated by the home government, afforded no relief and no protection until at length rebellion came—rebellion against the unjust and avaricious acts of an apparently heartless mother country. At first there was no thought of breaking off all the ties of parenthood and of seeking independence. The Colonies took up arms with the hope and expectation of causing the mother country to give them the rights which had been denied. But the war which followed was a long and tedious one. The Colonies were banded together in a loose confederation to fight as one in a common cause and for the common good. It became increasingly evident that complete independence was the only means through which they could obtain to the fullest measure the sacred rights for which they fought, and at length came the Declaration of Independence.

Now, let us digress a little to consider here an event which had a material bearing not only upon the success of the struggling Colonies but upon the future of the whole world. It was the adoption of a flag for the thirteen united States.

George Washington and other leaders in the early days of the War of the Revolution had noted the necessity for adopting a flag which would be the same for all of the troops of the Continental Army. It was noted that each contingent of troops brought its own flag. There was the pine-tree flag of the Carolinas, the peace-tree flag from Massachusetts, the rattlesnake flags, the stripes of the Philadelphia Light Horse, the Grand Union flag, the Eutaw flag of Colonel Washington, and many others. If men were to fight and win, it was necessary that they should fight as one, under a flag which typified their common interest and their unity of purpose. The presence of so many different flags could only tend toward petty sectional jealousies and discord. Resultantly, early in 1777 General Washington suggested to the Continental Congress the necessity of adopting a flag to be used by all of the Continental Armies. The matter was taken up and discussed, and finally on June 14, 1777, the Congress adopted a resolution reading:

"Resolved, That the flag of the thirteen United States shall be 13 stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be 13 stars in a blue field, representing a new constellation."

Now, where did the design of this flag come from? We are told that the first flag was made by Mistress Betsy Ross, of Philadelphia, and in the telling we are led to believe that the design was hers; but note that while she almost undoubtedly was the maker of the first official flag, yet the design of it was prescribed by the Congress sometime before it was made by her; and so the design was not hers. Some have thought that the design of the Stars and Stripes came from the shield of Washington; but although General Washington kept most careful and detailed notes of all his acts, official and otherwise, as leader of the Continental Armies, they nowhere contain any reference to a suggestion for the design of a flag. From what we know of the life and character of the man, it is certain that the use of any design so closely related to the emblem of any individual, more particularly himself, would have been abhorrent to his very nature as well as to the spirit of the times.

Some have suggested that the stripes at least may have been taken from the striped banner used by the Philadelphia Troop of Light Horse under which Washington was escorted out to assume command of the Continental Armies. Others suggest that the design was easily arrived at by substituting stars in the union of the grand union flag in place of the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew. If we turn to the records of the Continental Congress, all we find is that pursuant to the recommendation of the leaders in the field, a committee of three was appointed to consider a design, and that finally the resolution of June 14, 1777, was adopted. It is peculiarly significant that there are no records of the work of the committee which contain any reference to the design of the flag or from whence it came. It is even more significant that no single word as to the origin of the design can be found in any of the writings or memoirs of the historians and public men of that day. It seems we are forced to the conclusion that there was some good reason why the origin of that design should be so shrouded in mystery—and there is.

When the Great Weaver of our destinies looked down upon this world and saw the thirteen Colonies struggling against such powerful odds there can be no doubt that His great heart of hearts was filled with pity and compassion. Then when He considered the cause of the struggle—saw that it was for the sake of human liberty, and knowing the purity of the motives which lay back of it, He, in His omnipotence, realized the great need for unity of thought and purpose on their part. He then and there determined that they should have an emblem which would typify all those things so absolutely necessary to the success of their cause. And so He gathered together from among the cohorts of the dead the heart threads of all those who from the beginning of time had sacrificed their lives for the sake of human liberty. There were those which were dripping red with the blood of the patriots who had died at Concord, at Lexington, and at Bunker Hill; those which had been bleached to a celestial white by the æons of time which had passed over them; and from the blue sky of heaven came the blue threads for the Union in which, also taken from the blue vault of heaven, were to be set the white stars of faith and hope. He fed them into the loom of destiny; the wheels of time turned on, the shuttles of fate flew back and forth, and the warp and the woof ran true to the design in this Master Weaver's mind until the whole was finished; and then—

"When freedom from her mountain height
Unfurled her banner to the air
She tore the azure robe of night
And set the stars of glory there;
And, mingled with its glorious dyes,
The milky baldric of the skies.
Then from His mansion in the sky
She called her eagle bearer down
And gave into His mighty hand
The symbol of her chosen land"—

the most glorious emblem that ever floated on the breeze or rippled in the sun—the Star-Spangled Banner—the direct gift of God Almighty to the cause of human liberty, and it was given to us, "We, the people of the United States"; truly it was not meet that any human agency should be credited with the design of a thing so glorious and so sacred.

We now teach our children that the 13 stripes stand for the thirteen original Colonies, one for each of them—that there is a star for each of the present States; and that these stars in a blue field stand for our Union. It not only stands for that, but, oh, for so much more than that. It is the very heart and soul of the Nation.

Let us also teach our children and our children's children that those red stripes, dripping red with the blood of patriots which flowed at Concord, Lexington, and in rivers down the slopes of Bunker Hill, stand for courage, for zeal, and for devotion, even unto death. Those white stripes stand for the purity of the motives, for the truth, and the honor for which our forefathers died. That blue field, made from the blue sky of heaven, stands for liberty and freedom, justice and truth, and in it there stands the white stars of faith and hope; faith in the living God who made us, faith in the eternal life of our souls and in the eternal destiny of our Nation; and the stars of hope, the "hope that springs eternal in the human breast" and leads us ever onward unto higher and to better things.

My friends, that flag is a living, breathing thing, vibrant with the eternal life of the living souls of our honored dead, and it belongs to us, "We, the people of the United States." It is ours to love and to cherish, ours to live for, ours to fight for, and if need be, ours to die for.

It is a solemn thought and there can be no sacrilege in standing here, in this house of God, to-night and with bowed heads and humble hearts to say that there is a place on the right hand of God Almighty for every man, woman, and child who has given, or will give up, his, her, or its life in defense of that flag and the cause of human liberty for which it stands.

Under that flag our forefathers carried on the war for human liberty. France came to their aid and with the help of Lafayette and Rochambeau on land, and the fleets of the Comtes de Grasse and D'Estaing at sea, the army of Cornwallis was finally bottled up at Yorktown, where the final surrender of that army brought to a close our war for human liberty. We should never forget, nor underestimate, the value of the help which we received from France, and more particularly our debt of gratitude to the Marquis de Lafayette.

After the close of the war the Colonies, but loosely held together for the period of the war by the Articles of Confederation, struggled along; discord sprang up here and there; sectional needs gave rise to distrust and petty sectional jealousies until it seemed that all the principles for which the patriots had fought were to be cast aside and lost forever in internal strife and dissension. But common sense prevailed, and finally a constitutional convention was called to consider ways and means to unify the Colonies and provide for a common government. The result was the adoption of the Constitution of the United States of America, the most marvelous document ever drafted in the cause of humanity, and the purposes for which it stands are most admirably and forcibly stated in its preamble, to which your especial attention is invited. It was this instrument which first brought us into official existence as "We, the people of the United States," and it was done in the following terms:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Note especially the purpose for which "We, the people of the United States," adopted a constitutional form of government. They are the basic, the underlying purposes of all government, and have never been more clearly, concisely, nor more forcibly stated in any document of any description.

"To form a more perfect union," for in union there is strength.

"To establish justice," for justice is the basis upon which must ever rest all of man's relations to man. "To establish justice," so that each man might deal with his fellow man upon a basis of equality and freedom, with equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

"To insure domestic tranquility," that peace and harmony might exist at home, without which no nation or people could thrive and prosper.

"To provide for the common defense." That does not mean "militarism" in any sense whatever. It does mean, however, such adequate preparation against possible attacks from abroad as will guarantee "We, the people of the United States," the opportunity to live at peace with the whole outside world, as well as that domestic tranquility so necessary to the life of the Nation. It does not mean militarism in the so-called imperialistic sense of the word—for "We, the people of the United States"—that is, the citizens of the United States—are first, last, and all the time, the soldiers of the United States, the defenders of our country's flag, and all the sacred principles for which it stands—and, mark the words, the best citizen makes the best soldier, for in this land of liberty there stands no place for the mercenary soldier, the paid hireling who would sell his birthright for a mess of pottage. Citizens all, soldiers all, and adequate defense simply means such reasonable preparation as will give our children and our children's children that guaranty of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness which is the inalienable right of all mankind.

"To promote the general welfare"—that is, to provide for such institutions of science and learning, of government, and welfare, as will guarantee that steady progress to higher and better things toward which we are led ever onward by the white stars of "hope" which blaze forth in our country's flag.

And finally, "To secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Certainly there could be no nobler purpose at the root of any government. Liberty, that high altar of human desire upon which untold millions from the beginning of time have poured out their life-blood without stint. Liberty, the sacred cause for which the greensward at Concord and Lexington, and later the slopes of Bunker Hill, ran red with patriotic blood, and for the defense of which it is our solemn duty before God and man to keep ourselves adequately prepared.

And now let us see if we have kept the faith.

Under our Constitution, which when first promulgated, was laughed to scorn by the nations of the Old World, "We, the people of the United States" have thrived and prospered, until to-day we hold a place in the galaxy of nations which is second to none. We have had our trials, and they were not light ones. We have also had our days of weakness, days when it seemed that the cause of human liberty was to go down in ignominious defeat. Yet that flag has never been unfurled in any but a righteous cause, never in a war of aggression, but always, always in the cause of human liberty.

From the history of our past we read with shame and aching hearts of the day when as a Nation we bargained with crime and paid tribute to Tripolitan pirates, the robbers of the high seas, in order to secure the right to carry on peaceful trade with the nations bordering on the Mediterranean. And why, we ask ourselves, was such a blot ever put upon the Stars and Stripes? The answer is plain, convincing, and undeniable. It was because we were wholly unprepared to defend our rights and our flag upon the high seas. It is no excuse; it is only a disgraceful and weak-kneed plea in extenuation to say that England, that mighty sea power, France, and other nations did the same. The plain cold truth is that we were forced to bargain with crime, and we placed that blot upon our God-given emblem, "the Stars and Stripes," because we had failed to obey that mandate of our Constitution which bids us "provide for the common defense." Because of this failure we paid some $1,600,000, in tribute to crime. We, a free and independent nation, paid tribute, not to a more powerful nation under stress of arms, but as blood money to a bunch of barbarian pirates. Oh, the pity of it, the eternal shame of it! And, in the end we had to fit our ships and fight for our rights just the same.

Then from 1797 to 1800 was our war with our former ally, France, caused by the persistent plundering of our merchant ships by French cruisers and privateers. This war would not have occurred had "We, the people of the United States" not failed "to provide for the common defense." But for the fact that at the time France was engaged in the Napoleonic wars, it would have been a disastrous war for us. The underlying cause of the action taken by the French was our refusal to become their ally in those wars, and we have been blamed as an ungrateful nation because we refused to do so; but it was not the people of France whom we refused to help on that occasion. It was the cause which we refused to aid because it did not appear to be a just one.

Following the war with France, England began to make certain demands upon us and to claim certain privileges over us. Despite all of our protestations against the injustice of such claims, she continued to enforce them, because she knew that we were not prepared to defend our rights. She knew that again "We, the people of the United States," had failed to "provide for the common defense," and she proposed to take the fullest advantage of our weakness, until in the end we were forced into the War of 1812. During this war, because we were unprepared, we suffered ignominious defeat, and we saw our National Capital, the city of Washington, sacked. It was not until then, and after the success of some of our naval vessels in single combat against the English, that "We, the people of the United States," rose up in our might and drove the conquering invader from our shores. But, oh, the needless price we paid!

A few years later England again put forth certain unjust demands, which we firmly met, and a third war with England was avoided because at that time "We, the people of the United States," had adequate provision for the "common defense." The cost of war in blood and money was avoided on this occasion because we were prepared.

Next we come to the war with Mexico, a war ostensibly for the relief of Texas, but with the certain indefinite purpose of acquisition of territory in the background. We won the war, of course, and then, to save our conscience, paid Mexico $15,000,000 for the territory ceded to us in the treaty of peace.

There followed a period of peace during which the Nation prospered, but during which the seeds of internal discord, planted in the early days, sprouted, grew, and also thrived, until the year 1861 saw the beginning of our War between the States, the Civil War. This was one of the most bitterly fought wars ever recorded in history, a war in which father fought against son and brother against brother, and all in the cause of human liberty, for this war meant the very life or death of the Nation, and the Nation prevailed. We of the South accepted the issue, as all men who are good and true should, and set about healing our wounds and curing our sores. Oh, it was a bitter war, a cruel war. Yet no country need hang its head in shame which in times of stress produces such men as Abraham Lincoln, Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Robert E. Lee, "Stonewall" Jackson, Jeb Stewart, Longstreet, Pickett, and Beauregard.

To-day if you ask what was the real cause of this war the answer is that God Almighty had a mission mapped out for this Nation, and it was necessary that the working tools be tried, tried to the breaking point, and proven, and this cruel war was the "fiery crucible" through which we had to pass, from which this country, with its vast stretches of territory, its great diversity of interests, was to emerge a united Nation, a mighty Nation, one and indivisible, a proven Nation, fit to carry out the sacred mission laid out for us by the God of all nations.

There followed a period of peace, during which we were able to settle differences which came up between us and certain foreign nations because there was fresh in the minds of the people of those nations the realization that mighty forces could be called to arms in this country on a moment's notice, and not one of them relished the idea of facing men who had fought so gloriously and so valorously under the leadership of Lee and Grant.

Because we were prepared for the common defense during this period our rights were respected throughout the world and there was no need to resort to arms to maintain them.

But as time went on we became careless of this imperative need to provide for the common defense. There were those who, forgetting the past, said that the seas protected our country from invasion, and "We, the people of the United States," heard and believed. We made not even a gesture to provide for the defense of our flag upon those very seas and made but a pitiful pretense at a fleet. We were miserably helpless to hold back the convoys of any major nation which might seek to destroy us, and so it came about that in time our protestations to the Spanish Government about conditions in "bleeding Cuba" were laughed at. Finally we received our answer when the battleship Maine, then on a friendly mission, was blown up in Habana Harbor. It was then that our President asked the Congress for authority to call for 200,000 volunteers, and it was then that "We, the people of the United States," raised our voices in solemn warning and said, "Cuba shall be free." And our Spanish war was on.

All honor to the heroes of Guantanamo Bay, of Santiago Hill, and of the sea battles of Santiago de Cuba and Manila Bay. They, too, fought gloriously for the cause of human liberty, and to-day they, too, have their places within the folds of the Star-Spangled Banner. This war was of short duration but costly in men and money. And oh, the needless sacrifices; made chiefly because we had failed "to provide for the common defense."

However, the life of the Nation was revived, the wide world had seen that we were truly "one and indivisible," and so there followed another long period of peace and prosperity. Then came the time when the Imperial German Government sought to impose its will upon all the peoples of Europe, and the great World War began. We were not a party to it. We sought by every honorable means to keep out of it. But again we were unprepared, and so there came the time when, despite all our protests, our ships were sunk without warning, our women and children sent to the bottommost depths of the sea, and there they rest to-day. The greater our patience, the greater became the trials we were called upon to bear, until finally our President asked the Congress to declare "that a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the United States of America." Then, on April 6, 1917, "We, the people of the United States," again raised up our voices and gave him his answer: "We are with you, Woodrow Wilson, 100,000,000 strong."

Wholly unprepared for war—a pitiful Army, National Guard, and reserve of only 200,000 men, where millions were required; a Navy hopelessly inadequate to the task it had before it, and almost no shipping with which to help it out; armies to be raised, equipped, trained, and transported across the seas in the face of the untold dangers and horrors of a submarine warfare, and supplies for those armies. There were not even sufficient arms in our country with which to arm them. It was necessary to build docks in France from which they could disembark. Then hundreds of miles of railway—oh, it was a stupendous task, almost inconceivably so, but not a man faltered.

The souls of our honored dead had called to us from the folds of that flag to take up the torch in the name of human liberty, and "We, the people of the United States" answered that call. Truly, there was no one to falter.

Men were called to arms, ships were built, railways were built, arms and ammunition were procured in part from our allies, and in an incredibly short time the advance elements of the "American Expeditionary Force" had arrived in France, and there came a day when its leaders stood with bowed heads before the tomb of Lafayette. Then "We, the people of the United States" spoke through one of them again, spoke to the heart and soul of France, and to the cause of human liberty. The words were few and simple: "Lafayette, we are here." Few and simple, yes; but oh, so full of meaning. They came direct from the heart and soul of "We, the people of the United States," and they sunk deep down into the very heart and soul of war-torn France, and the people of France heard and understood.

But we were wholly unprepared, only partly trained, and inadequately equipped; and the German high command made no secret of their contempt for the hated Americans, the citizen soldiers from the land across the seas. There came the time when the question was on every lip: "What will the Americans do?" The answer was forthcoming at Chateau-Thierry, at Belleau Wood, at Blanc Mont, and in the forest of the Argonne.

There came the day when "We, the people of the United States," untried citizen soldiers, took our places in the battle lines. We were only expected to hold until a stronger position could be prepared in the rear, but in one place a part of our line was forced to retire. The French suggested that we take up a position in rear of the new line; and then it was that "We, the people of the United States" spoke out again through our leader: "Our flag has been forced to retire; it is inconceivable that such a thing should be. This day the American line will advance."

On that day, May 31, 1918, the picked and tried troops of the Imperial German high command felt the force of the citizen soldiers from beyond the seas, felt it and wavered. And that day "the American line did advance." Not only did they recover all lost ground but they drove the Germans back several kilometers beyond their own original positions. All the world saw; all the world wondered. But all the world know that thenceforward the world was to be "safe for democracy."

That night many men slept "Where poppies grow, between the crosses, row on row," and to-day they, too, have their places within the folds of the Star-Spangled Banner, and are enshrined in the hearts of "We, the people of the United States."

There was another occasion on which the order of the day was that the American line was to hold for a short while and then fall back to a prepared position. In due time a French staff officer conveyed the order to retreat to one of our regimental commanders, and then again "We, the people of the United States" spoke through that commander; "———, let the ——— Germans retreat; we have just come," and again that day the German high command learned that the citizen soldiers are men of iron. The living souls of the heroes of that day also took up their place within the folds of the flag. There they stand to-day, along with those who fell before Blanc Mont, in the forest of the Argonne, and up and down the line, wherever the cause of freedom demanded most.

The end was not long in coming, as was at first expected, and only a little over a year after our declaration of war the German high command, having tasted defeat at the hands of a despised foe—the citizen soldiers from across the sea—read the signs and offered terms of peace, later plead for peace, and finally in the forest of Compiegne, signed the armistice, the event which "We, the people of the United States" have gathered here to-night and in the meeting places throughout the length and breadth of this land to celebrate and give thanks for.

As we are gathered here to-night it seems that we are not alone, for there are voices calling to us. Oh, surely you can hear them! From Concord, Lexington, and Bunker Hill; from Chapultapec; from Gettysburg, Antietam, and the Wilderness; from Arlington on the Potomac; from the slopes of Santiago de Cuba, and from the far-off Philippines; from Chateau-Thierry and Belleau Wood; and from the forest of the Argonne; from the bottommost depths of the seven seas, and from the folds of our beloved flag, the direct gift of God Almighty to the cause of human liberty, the eternal souls of our honored dead are calling to us. They bid us keep faith to the end "that government of the people, for the people, and by the people shall not perish from the earth." It is well that we should heed their call; and so let us here and now rededicate ourselves, our children, and our children's children to the cause of human liberty, to the defense of that flag and all that it stands for, if need be, even unto death. Then "Its fame on brightest pages,

Penned by poets and by sages,
Shall go sounding down the ages
Until time shall be no more."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN—ADDRESS BY SENATOR SHORTRIDGE

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very wonderful address delivered by the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] at the Lincoln Memorial in this city yesterday, February 12, 1929, on the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. It is eloquent, appealing, concise, and strikingly persuasive. It tells a wonderful story and delivers an impressive message. It is democracy's epitome of one of the greatest characters in human history. It deserves a place in the records of this body, and I deem it an opportunity and an honor to urge that it be so received and permanently incorporated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, leave is granted.

The address of Mr. SHORTRIDGE is as follows:

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

My countrymen, the Republic "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal," in the throes of dissolution; the Union of Washington and Jackson, framed by the wisdom and sanctified by the blood of brothers, about to be rent asunder; the "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," in mortal danger of perishing from the earth—in that dark hour of estrangement, doubt, and fear the great captain of our country's salvation came.

He came, and thenceforth all was clear. Simple in speech, plain in manner, straightforward in action; tender as a child, fearless as a hero, humble and lowly, he came to speak and to act. Born of southern parents and reared in the broad prairies of the West, whose very winds sang liberty, he realized the curse of bondage and the blessing of freedom. From the unfelled forest, from the log cabin and the country store, from humble forum and obscure dwelling, from out the ranks of the people the great captain came. He came, and statesmen paused and wondered; he spoke, and a Nation hearkened to his counsel.

Devoted to truth and the right, opposed to falsehood and the wrong; scorning the tricks and subterfuges of the self-seeking and abhorring the mean and base; loving his country with a devotion that made him forgetful of all save the preservation of the Union, the incomparable leader rose. In judicial tribunal and hall of state, in capital and village, in stately mansion and log hut bewildered men listened to his words and saw, as they had never seen before, the darkness, the light, and the path; the wrong, the right, and the remedy.

Who was this man that came unheralded out of the West? Who was this man that rose above great statesmen of his day—who was as earnest as Phillips, as gifted as Baker, more profound than Seward, more wise than Chase, more logical than Douglas, more eloquent than Everett?

Who was this man that combined in one soul the simplicity of a child, the wisdom of a sage, and the foresight of a prophet?

Wheresoever among men there is a love for disinterested patriotism and sublime attachment to duty; wheresoever liberty is worshiped and loyalty exalted, his name, his life, his deeds are known. To-day his image is in all hearts, his name is on all lips. That humble, loving, forgiving, sublime man was the rail-splitter of Illinois—sainted and immortal Abraham Lincoln—Abraham Lincoln, child of poverty, champion of freedom, savior of the Union.

Rejoice and give thanks to God. The dark hour of brotherly estrangement is gone forever. The Constitution of Washington and Jackson remains. The Union, strong and great, endures. The "government of the people, by the people, and for the people" did not perish. The sons of America march all one way.

And for all these blessings we stand here to-day in this sacred place, beneath the one and only banner of the loyal heart, to pay the tribute of our veneration and gratitude and love to Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. SMITH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. I move that the Senate decline to agree to the amendments of the House, ask for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the managers at the conference on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. CAPPER, Mr. VANDENBERG, and Mr. COPELAND conferees on the part of the Senate.

MEMORIAL CHAPEL AND GYMNASIUM AT PLATTSBURG BARRACKS, N. Y.

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the second deficiency appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place in the bill, insert:

"Memorial chapel and gymnasium at Plattsburg Barracks, N. Y.: For the construction and equipment of a memorial chapel at Plattsburg Barracks, N. Y., $150,000, to be available until expended; and for the construction and equipment of a gymnasium at said barracks, $50,000, to be available until expended."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to have printed in the RECORD, and referred with the amendment to the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration a letter and inclosures from the Churchwomen's League for Patriotic Service, national president, Mrs. William Codman Sturgis, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the letter, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to accompany the proposed amendment, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHURCHWOMEN'S LEAGUE FOR PATRIOTIC SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1929.

MY DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: You asked for information concerning the proposed memorial chapel of Plattsburg Barracks.

The league of which I have the honor to be national president has its largest membership in New York, about 1,200 women of the Episcopal Church. Its Army post committee was formed in 1925 to further the work of the United States Army chaplains at the posts, and to increase the interests of civilians in our military service.

The chairman visited the War Department and was welcomed and encouraged by them. This committee, invited to a conference of 42 chaplains on Governors Island, heard there the needs of Plattsburg Barracks. On their decision to further the building of a memorial chapel there approval was obtain from General Pershing, General Summerall, and others. On December 10, 1925, at a meeting of prominent citizens in the home of Mrs. Arthur Curtiss James, of New York, the project was brought before the people. From that time on the league has sought to obtain the necessary funds to build the chapel as planned by the Goodhue Associates, approved by the War Department.

Our aims were:

First, to meet the obvious need of such a building and in a way that would add to the beauty and historical interest of the region.

Second, to show citizen approval of the "Plattsburg idea" and honor President Roosevelt and Gen. Leonard Wood who, with Henry L. Stimson, originated citizen training in our country.

Third, to give a permanent place for the memory of our World War heroes, especially those who went out from Plattsburg.

Fourth, to declare by the plan and use of the structure our adherence to religious toleration as expressed in our Constitution.

So far we have in the fund $20,855.38. We are about to incorporate, as the difficulty in raising the money will necessitate a longer campaign than we had expected. Our incorporators are: Chief Judge Benjamin N. Cardoza, Judge Philip J. McCook, Col. Thomas Denny, Col. William G. Bates, Mr. Thomas F. Conway, Mrs. A. G. Sanford, president of the Church Women's League for Patriotic Service (Inc.), of New York, and Miss Edith D. Hubbard, chairman of the Army posts committee.

I inclose a copy of my letter to President Coolidge which expresses our hope that the United States Government will complete the buildings lacking at Plattsburg, with our aid in raising such additional funds as will be necessary for the chapel.

We ask an apportionment of $200,000 to be divided as follows: $150,000 for the central part, tower, and historical windows of the chapel, and $50,000 for a suitable gymnasium, very much needed for the resident and the summer camp men.

I fear to make my statement too long, though I leave a great deal unsaid concerning this significant project. I should be glad to answer any questions at any time that you care to see me concerning this matter.

Very sincerely yours,

CAROLYN STURGIS
(Mrs. WILLIAM CODMAN STURGIS),
1717 Twentieth Street NW.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I ask your kind consideration of the possibility of giving the weight of your commendation to the inclusion in the Budget of a substantial sum toward the two important buildings still lacking at Plattsburg Barracks. I refer to the memorial chapel and the gymnasium. The latter was burned down several years ago and the narrow limits of military appropriations have made it impossible to rebuild. The dilapidated structure that does duty, among other uses, for a house of worship has been for three years the concern of the league of which I have the honor to be national president.

We hope to see built a structure which shall meet the needs of the post, be a worthy recognition of the service rendered by President Roosevelt and General Wood in initiating the "Plattsburg idea," and of the men who carried out those inspirations on the battle field, and also to serve as a proof that the religious toleration enjoined on us by the Constitution has not been forgotten. We have found much difficulty in raising the amount necessary. The so-called pacifists who say Army posts have no reason for being, and those who do not subscribe to General Washington's dictum that "Morality can not be maintained without religion," are hard to interest. Many think a great and proud nation should itself equip its Army posts.

It would be a gracious act if you could suggest to those who are responsible for the national Budget an appropriation to cover the costs of these buildings at Plattsburg Barracks. The league has gathered together $20,855.38 for the chapel. The plan calls for about $200,000 if the building is to be worthy the cause which it represents and the historic associations of the locality.

An appropriation of $150,000 would suffice to erect the central part of the memorial chapel as planned, with its tower and historical windows. The national organization, which I represent, will undertake to raise whatever sum might prove necessary for the completion of the building.

The chapel is the primary concern of the league, but it is obvious that the post is not fully equipped until there is also provided an adequate gymnasium.

CAROLYN STURGIS.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 28, 1929.

Mrs. WILLIAM CODMAN STURGIS,
1717 Twentieth Street NW., Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MRS. STURGIS: Your letter of January 27 regarding the buildings at Plattsburg Barracks has been received and by the President's direction it is being brought to the attention of General Lord, Director of the Bureau of the Budget.

Sincerely yours,

EVERETT SANDERS,
Secretary to the President.

MY DEAR GENERAL LORD: The President sends me word that my letter to him in regard to the needs of Plattsburg Barracks have been handed on to you.

We have a strong impression that whenever more funds are needed to enforce prohibition they are pinched off the military apportionment. Would it not be just, since the rumor is abroad that the light-hearted apportionment for enforcement of twenty-seven millions is to be cut down that a fragment of that princely sum should go to equipping the premier camp for citizen training in America, with its much and long needed chapel and gymnasium?

I have heard mothers tell what the Plattsburg camp has done for their sons. I know what a solvent of class prejudice it is; we have proof that the disruptive elements in our country are busy there with their propaganda. Can we not make Plattsburg a small reflex of West Point in the power to increase true patriotism, respect for law and order, and belief in God?

CAROLYN STURGIS.

WAR DEPARTMENT NOTES

MAY 3, 1927.

* * * * * * *

The Plattsburg Memorial Chapel: The conference of chaplains of the Regular Army, National Guard, and Organized Reserves, which has been in session in the office of the Chief of Chaplains, United States Army, has given unanimous approval to the plan of building a memorial chapel at Plattsburg Barracks, N. Y., as sponsored by the Churchwomen's League for Patriotic Service. Mrs. William C. Sturgis, 943 Lexington Avenue, New York, N. Y., chairman of the committee on Army posts of the league, said: "The Churchwomen's League is unique in that it was organized after the World War to conserve the energies of church women who had been active in war work. It has approved the principle and practice of military training camps and, since Plattsburg Barracks has had so large a part in training citizens for military service in time of emergency, it has decided to erect a chapel there as a memorial to soldier dead and to serve the religious needs of the young men trained there each year."

It is especially fitting that a chapel should be erected at Plattsburg Barracks where military training camps, that have become so popular, were begun by former President Theodore Roosevelt and Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, and where hundreds of young men are instructed each year in the art of being soldiers. This structure will serve to make real and tangible those spiritual values of life without which physical and mental attainments are incomplete. Thousands of young men will receive religious training here each year.

Plattsburg Barracks, situated on beautiful Lake Champlain, is an historic Army post. Troops have been continuously stationed there for more than one and one-half centuries. It was fought over during the Indian wars, the Revolution, and the War of 1812. At present the garrison numbers about 2,000 persons and has a Sunday school of about 125 children. It is entirely without a suitable place for worship, and the military personnel on duty there is overjoyed at the prospects of having a well-appointed chapel provided them in the near future.

When completed the Plattsburg Memorial Chapel will be denominationally composite in type suited to the religious needs of men of all creeds and beliefs. Ample space will be provided to house the activities in religious education and for the necessary studies, sacristies, choir, and robing rooms.

The approximate cost of the chapel when completed will be $250,000. It will fittingly express the spirit of religion, sacrifice, and devotion to God and country. It will be nonsectarian in character and open to the ministers and priests of all religious beliefs.

THE PLATTSBURG MEMORIAL CHAPEL

To be erected by the American people at Plattsburg Barracks to perpetuate the memory of those men who on this historic ground dedicated their lives to their country and went out never to return.

Sponsored by the Churchwomen's League for Patriotic Service (Inc.); headquarters, 130 East Fifty-seventh Street, New York; president, Mrs. Henry Gansevoort Sanford; secretary, Mrs. Robert Goodhue Clarkson; treasurer, Mrs. Malcolm Stuart; national president, Mrs. William Codman Sturgis.

WHY BUILD A CHAPEL AT PLATTSBURG?

Because religion should be recognized as an integral part of the Nation's life.

Because the heroic young soldiers who went forth from Plattsburg in the late war should have a memorial worthy of their patriotism and sacrifice.

Because a chaplain should have a chapel as a doctor has a hospital. There is now no place of worship at Plattsburg Barracks.

Because Plattsburg has been for over a century a permanent Army post and will continue to be.

Because the 3,000 to 4,000 young men who go in summer for military training should be trained in moral values as well, if they are to take into civilian life not only the fruits of discipline and order but the higher virtues of loyalty and self-sacrifice.

Because memorials to those who have shown these virtues even unto death should be placed where they can be a constant inspiration to those who follow.

The proposed design by the Bertram G. Goodhue Associates, architects for St. Thomas' Church, New York, shows a beautiful structure, gothic in feeling, expressing the spirit of religion and devotion to God and country. It provides a chapel for Protestant services, a chapel for Roman Catholic services, and a Jewish sanctuary, forming a unique structure, grouping under one roof the three principal forms of worship for which our Government furnishes chaplains.

THE PLATTSBURG MEMORIAL CHAPEL

I can think of nothing finer, if we wish to serve our country, than to erect a memorial to the men of the Plattsburg camp who gave their lives; for at that camp originated many of the ideas which distinguished our Army, and on its ground were dedicated the lives of many of those who went out never to return. (Gen. Charles P. Summerall, Chief of Staff, United States Army.)

WHY BUILD A CHAPEL AT PLATTSBURG?

Because religion should be recognized as an integral part of life.

Because the heroic young soldiers who went forth from Plattsburg in the late war should have a memorial worthy of their patriotism and sacrifice.

Because a chaplain should have a chapel as a doctor has a hospital. There is now no place of worship at Plattsburg Barracks.

Because Plattsburg has been for over a century a permanent Army Post and will continue to be.

Because the thousand men and their families stationed there all the year round should have the essentials of civilized life.

Because the 2,000 to 3,000 young men who go in summer for military training should be trained in moral values, as well, if they are to take into civilian life not only the fruits of discipline and order but the higher virtues of loyalty and self-sacrifice.

Because memorials to those who have shown these virtues even unto death should be placed where they can be a constant inspiration to those who follow.

THE PROPOSED MEMORIAL CHAPEL

Led by the Churchwomen's League for Patriotic Service (Inc.), a movement has been organized to erect at Plattsburg a memorial chapel. For this purpose $200,000 is needed, to be raised by popular subscription.

The chapel, designed by Bertram G. Goodhue Associates, architects of St. Thomas' Church, New York, will be an impressive and beautiful structure, Gothic in general design, expressing the spirit of religion, sacrifice, and devotion to God and country. It will provide a chapel for Protestant services, a chapel for Roman Catholic services, and a Jewish sanctuary. In this it will be a unique structure, having place for the three principal forms of worship to which the men of the training camp are accustomed.

A SHRINE OF PATRIOTISM

Plattsburg! What memories cluster around the most famous of Army training camps! Consecrated by the blood of patriots in the War of 1812, in our own time it became the center of the system inaugurated by Theodore Roosevelt and General Wood known as the "Plattsburg idea," which aroused America to the need of preparedness before our entrance into the World War.

From Plattsburg went forth, at the call of Woodrow Wilson, thousands of the brave young spirits who served under General Pershing on the battle fields of Europe. To Plattsburg, every summer, go thousands of young men for intensive training.

NO PLACE OF WORSHIP THERE

The permanent garrison comprises from 1,200 to 1,500 men. Many of the officers and soldiers have their families with them. There are about 125 children there. Since 1921 more than 18,000 young men have been there for training.

Yet there is at Plattsburg Barracks no place of worship for all these souls. In fair weather services are held on the parade grounds, at the bandstand or any place available, where hundreds gather at the various religious services—Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish.

INDORSED BY ARMY CHIEFS—GENERAL PERSHING WAS THE FIRST TO GIVE HIS HEARTY INDORSEMENT

One of the last letters written from the Philippine Islands by General Wood relative to the proposed chapel tells of his "keen interest and sympathy in the project." Governor Smith, of New York, expresses his "warm commendation of this worthy and patriotic purpose."

Secretary of War Dwight F. Davis says: "Your proposal to honor those who made the supreme sacrifice in the World War by providing a suitable house of worship at an Army post is most commendable. The selection of Plattsburg Barracks as the location for such a memorial is especially fitting because of the very large number of young men who were trained there for duty during the war."

Col. John T. Axton, Chief of Chaplains, United States Army, strongly emphasizes the necessity of a chapel there.

Ministers and prelates of all denominations have given the project their warmest commendation. Bishop Brent, formerly Chief of Chaplains, A. E. F.; Bishop Manning, of New York; the Catholic Bishop of Ogdensburg, northern New York; Rabbi Tintner, the well-known war chaplain, and others of the Jewish faith; Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, of Brooklyn; Bishop James De Wolf Perry, of Rhode Island; and many others.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, February 13, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, Thou art our God, and earnestly would we seek Thee. The depths of the riches of Thy wisdom and knowledge draw us apart. Thou art the joy of our joy, the peace of our peace, and the love of our love. Our hidden and unseen desires are before Thee. Sift them that they may be foregleams of Thy plan and presence. Throughout this day may our trusts be administered with minds that are wise and with hearts that are true. Look upon our country and the nations associated with us for the advancement of good will throughout the earth. In all things may they stand together for righteousness and justice. Clothe all of them with the high and noble elements of national life. And unto Thee be praises world without end. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the conference report in that the members of the House committee on the conference agree to Senate amendment No. 1, which is in violation of Rule XX, section 2, as amended June 1, 1920. That rule provides:

No amendment of the Senate to a general appropriation bill which would be in violation of the provisions of clause 2 of Rule XXI, if said amendment had originated in the House, nor any amendment of the Senate providing an appropriation upon any bill other than a general appropriation bill, shall be agreed to by the managers on the part of the House unless specific authority to agree to such amendment shall be first given by the House by a separate vote on every such amendment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the United States Code provides that there shall be appointed by the President one secretary, and it provides that his salary shall be $10,000 per annum. Now, of course, if the proper legislative committee of the House chooses to bring in a bill granting the President two additional secretaries, or if the House itself chooses to agree to an amendment of that kind, then very well and good; but we have adopted a rule that the Appropriations Committee shall not agree to any amendment that proposes new legislation without specific authority of the House, and I think in the interest of proper procedure and economy the Appropriations Committee of the House should understand that it is the will of the House that they follow that rule.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of order against the entire report?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I think it would have to be made to the entire report, and I therefore make the point of order against the entire conference report.

Mr. SNELL. Would the gentleman from Texas be willing to withdraw his point of order provided there is a separate vote on the amendment to which he objects?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will state very frankly that I will withdraw it if we are granted a separate vote on this amendment so that the integrity of the rules of the House will be observed. The only reason why I press the point of order is that the House has very properly adopted a rule to the effect that the Appropriations Committee shall not agree to any legislative amendment put on an appropriation bill by the Senate. I do not think that at any time consent should be given for the rule to be transgressed. The Appropriations Committee should understand they have no power to agree to a Senate amendment which proposes new legislation without specific authority from the House.

Mr. DENISON. No one can demand a separate vote.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Not except by unanimous consent, the way this conference report is arranged.

Mr. SNELL. Would it not be best to make a unanimous-consent request and have the House vote on that one amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the circumstances unanimous consent is possible. This is brought in as a separate disagreement, waiving the rule, and therefore this amendment could be treated separately.

Mr. SNELL. That is why I am submitting this inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that by unanimous consent the amendment could be considered separately.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it being a part of the conference report, which has gone to the Senate as well as having come to the House, and having probably been agreed to by the Senate, the only thing we could do to affect the situation would be by unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of this proposition in this way. I suggest that we consider the amendment No. 1 with the understanding, if the gentleman will permit, that if the House, after discussion, is in favor of the proposition, then the report will not be subject to the point of order; and on the other hand, if the House is adverse to favorable action on that the conference report goes back to conference.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I had in mind. I wanted a separate vote on that amendment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. My object in making the point of order is to protect the rules of the House. The House has the right, when the Senate puts on an appropriation bill a legislative amendment, to have that brought back to the House and have it explained by those in charge of the bill. Then vote upon it separately.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will yield, it is perfectly evident that the amendment is subject to a point of order. Nobody contests that point.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. There is no doubt about it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that this conference report has already been acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that pending the consideration of the conference report the Senate amendment No. 1 be considered in the House and the decision of the House taken with reference to it, with the understanding that if the House acts favorably upon amendment No. 1 there will be no point of order made against the report, and the report can then be taken up for consideration. If, however, the decision is adverse on amendment No. 1, the point of order pending against the report may be made and action taken, the same as is ordinarily done when a conference report is brought in that contains improper matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks whether there is any legislation authorizing this?

Mr. WASON. I do not think there is.

The SPEAKER. Then the point of order would be good. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the Senate amendment No. 1 may be considered first and separate from the rest of the conference report, with the understanding that if the House votes the amendment in, then the point will not lie against the conference report. If the House votes it out, then a point of order will lie against the report.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In the event unanimous consent shall be given to consider that amendment, would it be necessary to go into Committee of the Whole or would it be considered in the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be considered in the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Are we not doing a vain thing, inasmuch as the Senate has already agreed to the conference report and the conferees have been discharged? Would it not be necessary to take further action?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does the amendment contain?

Mr. SNELL. Provision for two additional secretaries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in question be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment No. 1.

Amendment No. 1: Page 2, after line 8, insert "two additional secretaries to the President, at $10,000 each."

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire to explain the reason for this amendment and why it was agreed to by the conferees and the necessity that the President should have three secretaries instead of one, as has been the case for a number of years? Why will Mr. Hoover need three secretaries?

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in this amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire moves that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 1.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New Hampshire yield for a moment?

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Are these two additional secretaries deemed necessary on account of the very large majority which the President elect got at the last election? [Laughter.]

Mr. WASON. I was not fully informed, but I understood that this additional man was needed as a clerk to assist the new President, and I have no doubt but that by the addition of that man it will be possible for North Carolina to receive its proportionate part of this man's service. [Laughter.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. While the amendment carries two additional secretaries, there will really be only one additional. There is $7,500 carried in the bill for a gentleman already down there. The increase of the appropriation is $12,500, and there is an increase of but one employee.

Mr. SABATH. Do I understand the gentleman to state that these two additional secretaries are required because one is needed to take care of that section of country from which the gentleman hails, or is it because of the large number of applications that are now pending and the demands which are being made from that section upon the President that he will have to have a man from that section appointed to take care of all those applications and demands?

Mr. WASON. I want to say to my friend from Illinois that that information was not furnished to us. I was simply answering the inquiry of your friend and mine from North Carolina, and I was not referring to any other part of the country that would be benefited, but I am sure that the district which my distinguished friend from Illinois represents will see the reflected benefit if the House approves of this amendment.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The gentleman recalls what the Governor of North Carolina said to the Governor of South Carolina?

Mr. WASON. I was not present.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WASON. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], a member of the committee, has given an explanation of the amendment which should make it entirely clear to everyone.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. May I inquire who asked for the additional secretary that is provided for?

Mr. WASON. I understand there was a Budget estimate, which went to the Senate. That is my information.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. With the recommendation that the new position be created?

Mr. WASON. With that suggestion; yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

PROHIBITING THE EXPORTATION OF ARMS TO NATIONS VIOLATING THE PACT OF PARIS

Mr. KORELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House Joint Resolution 381, which I introduced on January 18.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on House Joint Resolution 381. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KORELL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, our country has manifested its support of the cause of peace throughout the world by concluding a treaty with practically all of the civilized powers of the world in which the signatories have condemned recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounced it as an instrument of national policy in their relation with one another. By a separate covenant appearing in the same instrument the United States of America, and all the other signatories, have agreed that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be which may arise among them shall never be sought except by pacific means. The treaty to which I refer was concluded at Paris, France, on the 27th day of August, 1928, and is universally known as the pact of Paris. It was ratified after a protracted debate in the United States Senate on the 16th day of January, 1929. The vote for its ratification stood 85 yeas and 1 nay.

The Senate's ratification of the multilateral treaty has produced a result that is revolutionary. The treaty reverses the position that war has heretofore occupied in the realm of international law by delegalizing it. In the past war has been regarded in international law as a perfectly legitimate means by which a nation might advance its interests or its policies. Now, a nation that resorts to arms must vindicate its course or lose the respect of the civilized world. A violation of the treaty constitutes an offense against every signatory to the pact. It makes the nation that shall start a war a lawbreaker and guilty of an international crime. My reason for requesting your consent to these remarks is to place before you a personal observation on one of the criticisms that has been expressed against the treaty. Also, to suggest a method by which greater assurance that its covenants will be respected may be obtained.

The critics who scoff at the treaty because it merely pledges the signatories to a principle of policy have failed to appreciate its full importance. They have strained too much for a technical construction of its language. In doing this they have completely overlooked its real if not its vital significance. They have also ignored the phrase appearing in the preamble which states in effect "that violators should be denied the benefits of the treaty." Manifestly, ratification of the treaty has destroyed the distinction between all kinds of wars. There can not be a legal as distinguished from an illegal war under the treaty. Henceforth it will only be necessary to determine whether a party has violated the pact of Paris in order to say which nation is acting in self-defense and which is the agressor. The covenants of the treaty will be the sole test. Again, the powers which have elected to accept "the benefits furnished by this treaty" are bound to do everything that will assure all of the parties to it the full enjoyment of the benefits to which each as a signatory is entitled. In other words, they are pledged to refrain from doing everything inconsistent with the policy which it declares.

Signing the treaty has ipso facto destroyed the neutral status of each signatory. All are now tangibly and directly concerned with its observance and breach. The very conception of neutrality presupposes the legality of war. Therefore a declaration of neutrality is neither logical nor tenable. Neutrality is inconsistent with the covenants of the treaty.

To denounce and renounce war clearly implies that one will not resort to war. It also implies that one will not aid another in doing that which he himself has expressly covenanted not to do. This conclusion is irresistible. To contend otherwise would be ridiculous. Accordingly applying this construction to the covenants of the treaty it is clear that all the nations that have signed the pact of Paris are bound not to give aid or comfort to a nation that shall resort to war. In fact, to go a step farther, one is justified in insisting that the act of supplying a belligerent nation with the resources of war, would not only be a serious breach of faith under the treaty but also that such an act would be equivalent to making the nation doing so an accomplice to the crime of war in the same manner and to the same extent that placing a gun in the hands of a murderer to kill one's neighbor would make an individual an accessory to the homicide.

I agree with those who entertain the view that the mere signing of the pact of Paris has not obligated the United States to join in positive measures to suppress a war. I also agree that each signatory is still free to a certain extent to exercise its own discretion with respect to the method by which it shall take cognizance of a violation of the covenants of the pact of Paris. But I strongly dissent from the opinion of those critics who believe that a signatory can be indifferent to future wars or to participate directly or indirectly in one except in defiance of its solemn pledge. Such a construction would do violence to language. If I am correct in this contention and in the assumption which naturally follows that the United States is bound to refrain from giving aid or comfort to the nation that shall violate the covenants of the treaty, Congress should, in all honor and good faith, take advantage of this opportunity to prohibit private manufacturers from supplying offending nations with the resources of war.

In connection with the thought which I have hastily and very briefly sketched I will call your attention to the provisions of a resolution that I introduced on January 17, the day following the vote in the Senate, and before the treaty in question was signed by the President. It is marked by the Clerk, House Joint Resolution 381, and reads as follows:

House Joint Resolution 381, Seventieth Congress, second session

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 16, 1929.

Mr. KORELL introduced the following joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 381) to prohibit the exportation of arms, munitions, or implements of war to nations violating the pact of Paris

Whereas the United States of America having heretofore manifested its support of the cause of peace throughout the world by having concluded a treaty with practically all of the civilized powers of the world in which the signatory parties have condemned recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounced it as an instrument of national policy in their relation with one another and have also agreed that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be which may arise among them shall never be sought except by pacific means, said treaty being dated the 27th day of August, 1928, and universally known as "The pact of Paris"; and

Whereas the conclusion of said treaty having imposed no legal obligation upon the United States of America or any other power to join in police action against a cosignatory which shall hereafter violate the same except to place upon each party the moral duty to refrain from giving aid or comfort to such cosignatory; and

Whereas it appearing to the Congress of the United States of America that in the event of the violation of said treaty by a cosignatory that the act of supplying the offending party with the resources of war would be tantamount and equivalent to making the state doing so an accomplice to the aggression of such offender and a breach of good faith; and

Whereas that it should therefore be the policy of the United States of America, without recognizing or assuming any obligations to join in positive measures of suppression, to manifest its disapproval of any violation of the covenants and provisions of the pact of Paris: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States of America to prohibit the exportation of arms, munitions, or implements of war to any State which shall violate any of the covenants and provisions of the multilateral treaty concluded on August 27, 1928, known as "The pact of Paris."

SEC. 2. Whenever the President shall recognize the act of a cosignatory party as constituting a violation of the covenants of "The pact of Paris" by proclamation it shall be unlawful, except by the consent of Congress, to export, or attempt to export, any arms, munitions, or implements of war from any place in the United States, or any possessions thereof, to the territory of such offending State or to any place outside of the United States if the ultimate destination of such arms, munitions, or implements of war is within the jurisdiction of such offending State, or in control of either its military or naval forces.

SEC. 3. As used in this joint resolution, the term "arms, munitions, or implements of war" means—

1. Rifles, muskets, carbines.

2. (a) Machine guns, automatic rifles, and machine pistols of all calibers; (b) mountings for machine guns; (c) interrupter gears.

3. Projectiles and ammunition for the arms enumerated in Nos. 1 and 2 above.

4. Gun-sighting apparatus, including aerial-gun sights and bomb sights, and fire-control apparatus.

5. (a) Cannon, long or short, and howitzers, of a caliber less than 5⅞ inches (15 centimeters); (b) cannon, long or short, and howitzers, of a caliber of 5⅞ inches (15 centimeters) or above; (c) mortars of all kinds; (d) gun carriages, mountings, recuperators, accessories for mountings.

6. Projectiles and ammunition for the arms enumerated in No. 5 above.

7. Apparatus for the discharge of bombs, torpedoes, depth charges, and other kinds of projectiles.

8. (a) Grenades; (b) bombs; (c) land mines, submarine mines, fixed or floating; depth charges; (d) torpedoes.

9. Appliances for use with the above arms and apparatus.

10. Bayonets.

11. Tanks and armored cars; aircraft designed for purposes of warfare.

12. Arms and ammunition not specified in the above enumeration prepared for use in warfare.

13. Poisonous gases, acids, or any other articles or inventions prepared for use in warfare.

14. Component parts of the articles enumerated above, if capable of being used in the assembly or repair of the said articles or as spare parts.

SEC. 4. Whoever exports, or attempts to export, any arms, munitions, or implements of war in violation of the provisions of this resolution shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not exceeding $10,000 and by imprisonment not exceeding two years. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report any such violation of the provisions of this resolution to the United States district attorney for the district wherein the violation is alleged to have been committed.

This resolution follows in the main the provisions of the Burton resolution, now before the House with a favorable report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The only difference between the two resolutions is that the last one is somewhat narrower in its scope than the first.

If adopted, the resolution I have quoted will put teeth in the multilateral treaty. It will provide a penalty for its violation. Moreover, it points the way to the imposition of more severe penalties should the one suggested prove ineffectual. I believe that it represents the natural and logical step that should be taken by our Government following the submission and conclusion of the pact of Paris. In my opinion, it advances a policy toward international relations in which the world's greatest industrial and peace-loving nation may very properly assume the leadership and invite all other signatories to follow. I am anxious that the principle which it advances should be adopted if the broader principle advanced by the Burton resolution should not prove to be acceptable to the House. Incidentally, I urge everyone to read the report of the hearings on the Burton resolution.

Without undertaking to discuss at this time the provisions of the resolution in detail, I will call your attention to the fact that it does not relate in any way to articles that can be used for peaceful purposes. It deals exclusively with specific articles that are manufactured for war purposes and can only be used for carrying on warfare. If you will read it carefully, you will find that it does not even prohibit the exportation of the articles which it enumerates, except in one respect, and that is to a country which shall violate the covenants of the treaty. It also provides that the President must recognize the act of a cosignatory as constituting a violation by requiring his proclamation before the embargo actually becomes operative. It has absolutely no application to rebellions and civil wars or even foreign quarrels that are not in contravention of the pact of Paris. Another factor which I believe is important is the clause "except by the consent of Congress," which appears in the resolution. This clause preserves a referendum on the action of the President in the event that the Members of the House of Representatives should conclude that he has acted too hastily or unwisely in an instant case.

Some people may conclude after reading the resolution that it places too great a responsibility and power upon the President. I do not think so. Presidents are expected to shoulder just such duties. We already have a law conferring authority upon our Chief Executives to place an embargo on arms when shipped to Central or South America, and two Republican and one Democratic Presidents have exercised their power under it. A specific instance of its exercise occurred in August, 1913, when President Wilson declared that in forbidding the exportation of arms and munitions to Mexico he was following the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality. Again, upon careful examination, I think that you will find that there is nothing in the resolution requiring the President to make a decision in a close case or that will prevent him from placing an embargo on shipments to both belligerents if circumstances should dictate the wisdom of such a course. Moreover, he is not compelled to exercise his power if he does not think that it will be wise or advisable to do so. Personally, I can not conceive of the President issuing his proclamation in advance of an exchange of views among the various powers to the treaty, in a case where the act alleged to constitute the violation is not clear or in advance of the crystallization of public opinion. On the other hand, he is not bound to confer with other powers. The very broadest discretion is conferred. For one, I have every confidence that our Chief Executives will exercise it wisely. To withhold the responsibility and power from the President to decide when the embargo should become effective, in the first instance, might prevent suppressive steps being taken while Congress is not in session. Such a situation might truly render the treaty a purely "pious gesture" or a "scrap of paper" in cases where time is a vital element.

I have just said that prohibiting the exportation of arms to a signatory violating the treaty is a mild form of penalty—perhaps the mildest rebuke that could be devised, considering the nature and various ways of dealing with a serious international offense. Alongside of force, economic boycotts, withdrawal of financial aid, blockades, and various other devices it can hardly be considered even a punishment. In fact, such an embargo might easily be justified without reference to the treaty at all and solely upon the announcement of a policy that it is the desire of the United States to "starve war instead of babies." This is the purport of the Burton resolution if I understand its meaning correctly. It might be of interest to say in this connection that the United States was the first nation in the world to adopt laws requiring its citizens to observe rules of neutrality. Hence there should not be any fear of establishing a precedent. We have been setting them up for the world for a long time.

The proclamation of neutrality issued by Washington on April 22, 1793, reads as follows:

> Whereas it appears that a state of war exists between Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, Great Britain, and the United Netherlands of the one part, and France on the other, and the duty and interest of the United States require that they should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent powers:
> I have therefore thought fit by these presents to declare the disposition of the United States to observe the conduct aforesaid toward those powers, respectively; and to exhort and warn the citizens of the United States carefully to avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever which may in any manner tend to contravene such disposition.
> And I do hereby also make known that whatsoever of the citizens of the United States shall render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the law of nations by committing, aiding, or abetting hostilities against any of the said powers, or by carrying to any of them those articles which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations will not receive the protection of the United States against such punishment or forfeiture; and, further, that I have given instructions to those officers to whom it belongs to cause prosecutions to be instituted against all persons who shall, within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, violate the law of nations with respect to the powers at war, or any of them.

Prior to the issuance of this proclamation it had been the custom and common practice of all nations to permit their citizens to enlist in foreign armies and to aid belligerent nations to conduct hostilities in every conceivable way. There was no restriction or restraint whatever. The only penalty that had been imposed was merely the danger which individuals ran of having their goods confiscated if they fell into the hands of belligerent powers, a penalty to which their own country warned them in advance that they would be abandoned. A notable instance of how neutrality was observed prior to Washington's proclamation was the employment of Hessian soldiers by the British Government during the Revolutionary War.

Just to give you a slight conception of how nations remained neutral prior to Washington's proclamation, reference might be made to the way maritime warfare was waged. Everyone familiar with history knows that freebooters were converted into a sort of irregular militia under the name of "privateers" and subject to the jurisdiction of Admiralty courts. To speak more plainly, warfare was waged along strictly piratical lines. Down to the end of the sixteenth century neutral commerce had not yet attained any great proportions and was left to the mercy of belligerents and the so-called privateers. With the establishment of regular navies, however, the existing customs commenced to be abrogated or modified and increasing navigation made it necessary to establish rules which are recognized to-day as part of international law in order to secure the free intercourse of nations. The first organized effort for the purpose of protecting freedom of navigation against belligerents was a league of nations formed by Russia in 1780. This league formulated a declaration which is known as the First Armed Neutrality. The substance of this declaration was that neutral nations might freely navigate from port to port and along the coast of nations at war and that the goods belonging to subjects of powers at war should be free on board neutral vessels, with the exception of contraband merchandise.

In 1871 the treaty of Washington provided:

> A neutral government is bound, first, to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction to warlike use. Secondly, not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men. Thirdly, to exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters and, as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

In The Hague convention of 1907 the duties of neutral powers in naval warfare were restated, as follows:

> The supply in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power to a belligerent power, of warships, ammunition, or war material of any kind whatever is forbidden.
> A neutral power is not bound to prevent the export or transit for the use of either belligerent of arms, ammunitions, or, in general, of anything which could be of use to an army or fleet.

From this brief and hasty review of what neutrality meant prior to Washington's proclamation and the development of neutral rights since the conclusion of the first armed neutrality pact in 1780, you will see that the traffic in arms, munitions, and implements of war by private citizens of neutral nations with the governments of foreign countries engaged in hostilities has never been recognized as legitimate commerce, that the most that can be said for it is that it has not been expressly prohibited or restricted by our Government, and that the only change that the resolution proposes to make is to prohibit private manufacturers from running the risk of having their goods seized and confiscated.

While prohibiting the exportation of arms to a signatory that shall break faith with us is a mild penalty—it is important to recall that, if the outlaw nation's resources for conducting war could be effectively cut off, it would be reduced very quickly to impotence. The experience of the last war demonstrated that even the most powerful, highly industrialized, and well-prepared nations can be successfully curbed under this kind of pressure. In my opinion the threat of an arms embargo by the United States would serve as a great deterrent to pugnacious nations contemplating future wars of aggression. The certain knowledge that an embargo would be established, coupled with the realization that the nation against which it was directed would be under a heavy handicap from the start would unquestionably cool the martial spirit and ardor for war. Under the present policy only the nation that has been strong enough to control the seas has gotten the benefit of American arms and ammunition. Hence we have had the anomalous situation of the United States aiding the strong against the weak in every instance, regardless of the merits of the conflict.

I have just said, and I repeat, that it is altogether unlikely that the President will issue his proclamation in advance of an exchange of views with other signatory powers. Suppose he follows this course. Suppose, moreover, that the leading industrial nations of the world should decide the question of war guilt and establish a common embargo. Would the treaty have teeth? Will it be an "idle gesture" or "a scrap of paper"? Will there be a penalty provided for its violation? And while you conjure over these thoughts I will ask another question. Is it unreasonable to think that the nations that followed the lead of the United States in signing the treaty would not follow our lead in the method of its enforcement? On the other hand, suppose that all of these expectations should prove to be too altruistic. What would we have lost—anything more than a few dollars? Is the cost too great a sacrifice for such an experiment? I, for one, refuse to say so. It is notorious that our very handling of this business has condemned us abroad as a nation of war profiteers.

Just a few days ago the world was startled by the rumble of war between Bolivia and Paraguay. Drums were beating, flags were flying, and the martial spirit was running high. Through the friendly intercessions of foreign diplomats these two countries were halted on the very brink of battle. They were induced to resort to arbitration for the settlement of their differences. A pact was concluded between them in which both agreed not to resort to force. Following the signing of this agreement two friendly neighbors to our south, upon their own initiative and commendable judgment, refused to permit shipment of arms, munitions, and implements of war either from or through their respective countries to Bolivia and Paraguay. This evidence of national consciousness, in addition to being revolutionary, was inspiring. It shines out to-day as a worthy example for other nations of the world to pattern. It is destined to rank in history with the epochal proclamation of Washington. Every people and every country can profit from the precedent set up by Chile and Argentina.

The resolution which I have introduced does not go as far as Chile and Argentina have voluntarily gone. If it is adopted it will only require the United States to withhold aid in cases where a clear breach of faith has been committed against us and when our own pledged word to other nations is involved.

In conclusion let me say the paramount question in the minds of many people to-day is: What policy should the United States pursue in the event the multilateral treaty is violated? The answer to this question is one of supreme importance. It can, of course, be delayed until an actual breach occurs, but eventually it must be faced. With this question before us I ask you, Is it not better to solve the problem now while our country is at peace instead of waiting until it shall come under the strain of an emergency and the pressure of conflicting war sentiment? We have brought the principle of policy expressed in the pact of Paris to fruition. Therefore let us become the leaders in strengthening it. Let us be the first to propose one of the means by which its covenants will insure real security. Let us silence the cynics and those who taunt us with hypocrisy. It is our highest duty and for our greatest interest to strengthen the treaty. An enduring peace throughout the world is necessary for our greater progress and prosperity. Any armed conflict, however remote from our shores, will necessarily affect us. At the present time our foreign trade extends to the most distant geographical regions. Our foreign loans aggregating a substantial percentage of our national wealth are spread all over the globe. Economic conditions make world peace a necessity for us. Our adherence to the covenants of the treaty places us under a moral obligation to exert our every influence against the outbreak or the continuance of another war.

Since House Joint Resolution 381 was first introduced a number of bills and resolutions seeking the establishment of the same principle and the accomplishment of the same purpose have been received in both branches of Congress. I am glad to note and welcome their appearance. Their introduction evidences the very widespread interest that exists to-day in proposals to strengthen the covenants of the pact of Paris. I am also delighted to see the cordial and very general approval that the press throughout the country has given the various resolutions as they appeared in both branches of Congress. Favorable news comments have done much in developing public opinion supporting the cause of world peace in the United States. While it is probably impossible to obtain a vote on House Joint Resolution 381 during the short time that remains of this session of Congress, I hope that all the resolutions that have appeared will be carefully studied by the Members and that a vote may be had on one or more of them in the next Congress. I especially urge that careful attention be given to the advisability of incorporating in any legislation that shall be adopted a list of the specific articles to fall under the ban which the various resolutions proposed should be placed. The difficulty in deciding what constitutes contraband has frequently given cause for disputes in the past. These should be avoided in the future, and I have endeavored to anticipate them in my resolution. In this respect it differs from many that have since been introduced.

CONSTRUCTION AT MILITARY POSTS

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 13825, a bill to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 13825, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I objected yesterday for the reason that this bill contains among other appropriations an item of $400,000 for a new building at Governors Island, notwithstanding the fact that both the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee and the next ranking member, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES], has agreed that nothing should be done on Governors Island which would encumber all of the land there so as to make it impossible to be used later on as a terminal aviation field. If we authorize more building and later the island will be used as a landing field, it will necessitate the destruction of the buildings now there and the loss of millions of dollars. I have conferred with the chairman and also with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES], and they are now working out a plan which will draw a dead line so as to prevent the War Department from carrying on its intentional and destructive plans of placing new buildings all over the island in order to defeat the wishes of Congress and the logical and inevitable use of the island as a terminal aviation field.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania another question. In this bill and in another bill we have appropriated several hundred thousand dollars for new buildings at West Point. When the West Point buildings bill went through the House I raised the point that we were providing $800,000 for that new building and asked the acting chairman if that was all that was required. He frankly stated that he would see to it that the amount would be sufficient to complete the building. No sooner had the bill passed the House than the West Point officials commenced to change the plans and the location of the building so as to put it up against a hill which would require more excavation and without any question increase the cost by $350,000, an amount which will surely be requested in a deficiency bill next year. The War Department refuses to cooperate with us on this point, although the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] agree that the honest thing to do is to keep faith with the House and not permit the shifting of this bill so as to require additional cost. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he has taken that matter up with the War Department and what assurance the War Department has given him that the intent of Congress will not be defeated.

Mr. MORIN. I will say to the gentleman that I have taken it up with the War Department, but they have not given me any assurance.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What is the gentleman going to do about it?

Mr. MORIN. So far as it lies within my power I am going to try to see that they keep faith with Congress.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman favor a bill that will fix the location of this building at West Point?

Mr. MORIN. I will, and I think that should be done.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, with that assurance, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following conferees: Messrs. MORIN, JAMES, and MCSWAIN.

CARVILLE D. BENSON

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, it is my painful duty to announce the death of a former Member of this House on Saturday, February 8, 1929, the Hon. Carville D. Benson. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a brief statement covering his public career.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Carville D. Benson, who died on February 8 last, was one of Maryland's outstanding citizens, and his life, the respect, and esteem in which he was held by the people of his State is worthy of record thereof being made in this form.

Mr. Benson was born at Halethorpe, Baltimore County, on August 24, 1872, being the eldest son of the late Oregon R. and Carvilla Brian Benson. During his entire life he lived in Baltimore County, Md. Following his admission to the practice of law in the State of Maryland, he soon gained the position of distinction and was recognized as a capable, earnest trial lawyer. Public life, however, soon attracted his attention, and in 1904, a comparatively young man, he was elected by his county to the house of delegates. This seat he retained from 1904 to 1910; during the season of 1906 he was speaker of the house of delegates. At the session of 1908 and 1910 he was the Democratic floor leader. Recognizing his ability as a legislator, he was elected in 1912 and 1914 to the State senate, and in 1918 was returned to the house of delegates. Upon the death of the late J. Fred C. Talbott, Representative in Congress from the second congressional district of Maryland, Mr. Benson was elected in 1918 to fill out Mr. Talbott's unexpired term, and later to a full 2-year term. He served therefore in the Sixty-fifth and Sixty-sixth Congresses. He was renominated in 1920, but was defeated in the Harding landslide. In 1924 Gov. Albert C. Ritchie appointed him State insurance commissioner, in which office he served until his death. He was a member of numerous lodges and organizations, including the Masonic fraternity; thirty-second degree Scottish Rite Masons; the Beauseant Commandery, Knights Templars; the Boumi Temple, Mystic Shrine; the Tall Cedars of Lebanon; St. John's Chapter, Royal Arch Masons; the Mount Vernon Lodge; the Chesapeake Consistory; the Towson Lodge of Elks; the Loyal Order of Moose, the Jerusalem Council; the Baltimore Athletic Club; the Real Estate Board of Baltimore; and the Southern Maryland Society. Mr. Benson died February 8, 1929, at the age of 56 years and was buried in Cedar Hill Cemetery, Anne Arundel County, on February 11, 1929. He leaves surviving his widow, Mrs. Harriette Miller Benson, and six children, namely: John O. Benson, Carville D. Benson, jr., William Howard Benson, Brian Miller Benson, Miss Harriette Benson, and Mrs. Carvilla Benson Beecher, and also a brother, Mr. Oregon R. Benson, jr.

From the time of Mr. Benson's first election to public office, in 1904, and prior thereto, he was most active in the cause of the Democratic Party, with which he was affiliated. He soon was recognized as a capable organizer and a forceful speaker. He represented his party in the Democratic National Conventions at St. Louis in 1916, New York in 1924, and Houston in 1928. Taking up his duties in the Sixty-fifth Congress, following as he did the almost unbroken service of his illustrious predecessor over practically a quarter of a century, his task was not an easy one. The second congressional district had become accustomed to service at the hands of Congressman Talbott, which was hard to match. The district, almost as large as any two in Maryland and one of the largest in the country, presented business and individual interests which made it necessary for him to be familiar with almost every important piece of legislation. He performed that task well, and when the test came he was reelected to the Sixty-sixth Congress by a very flattering majority. But for the landslide in 1920, it is safe to predict, Mr. Benson would have ended his life in the House of Representatives or in the United States Senate.

When one's journey through life has been so marked with public service to his people lies down to permanent rest, nothing presents a fairer estimate and a more lasting monument to that service than the expression from those who are familiar with his life, who have been closely associated with him in that public service, and who were his friends. Let me therefore set forth what a few of those possessing that advantage and pleasure had to say following his death.

Gov. Albert C. Ritchie, of Maryland:

I had known Senator Benson for the greater part of my life. Before I took any part in politics I knew him, and my admiration for him then was great. My devotion to him increased as he became successively an earnest public leader and an excellent officer of the State.

His death comes to me as a personal loss. The State, too, loses by his death. His work in the insurance department was marked by progress and by the confidence he elicited from those persons most concerned with insurance in the State.

Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS, United States Senator, Maryland:

Carville D. Benson was the kind of man who made strong friendships. Analytical, industrious, and energetic, he was always one of the dominant figures wherever men congregated. He was interested in the individual man and in men in the mass. He understood them. He sensed their feelings and strived with might and main to improve the general condition of mankind. His contacts were permanent. His early friends were his last friends. He never traded old friends for new. He was loyal to the core to the cause and to the men he chose to follow.

He had many of the finest qualities of leadership.

He passes after a notable career of public service and leaves for all of us a void and a host of friends behind who will always think of him in the most affectionate manner.

Hon. WILLIAM CABELL BRUCE, United States Senator:

I was brought into contact in many ways with Carville D. Benson. I knew him well, and met him frequently both when he was a member of the Maryland House of Delegates and when he was a member of the Maryland Senate. His conspicuous abilities and his great force of will made him one of the most influential of the members of those bodies. Later, after he had been a Member of the House of Representatives, he managed the political campaign which resulted in my election to the United States Senate. This was in 1922. His management was distinguished by the highest degree of energy, tact, and intelligence. For years—indeed, down to the day of his death—he was one of the best known of the public men of Maryland. Faithful in his family relations and friendships, honorable in his personal and business life, a forceful speaker and sagacious legislator and party leader, the death of Carville D. Benson was a grave loss to both social and political life.

Hon. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM, Representative from the fourth congressional district of Maryland:

I knew "Carville Benson" (the name by which the Hon. Carville D. Benson was familiarly known to his friends) from his boyhood days. He was of purely Maryland ancestry, his people, both paternal and maternal, having been residents of the State for several centuries. From childhood he was always of a cheerful nature; he saw the bright side of things, and always tried to enjoy the good things of life; he was never happier than when he was surrounded by his family or his host of friends, and usually he was one of the ringleaders for enjoyment and pleasure. He, like all men in public life, had his enemies, but I do not believe he was an enemy to any of them; he couldn't be; it wasn't his nature to be unkind or hold enmity toward anyone.

I think he must have inherited this cheerfulness, happiness, and good will toward all from his most estimable mother, who was always so good, kind, and charitable to all and likewise a very devoted Christian.

I entered the Legislature of Maryland in 1904 with Mr. Benson, and later served with him in Congress. While we did not agree upon everything, he was earnest, energetic, and able, and I can safely say was one of the ablest men of the 1904 General Assembly of Maryland. His delegation represented the wealthiest and most populous county of our State; its needs for legislation far exceeded those of any other county; in fact, was largely in line with those of the great city of Baltimore—our metropolis.

One of the outstanding pieces of legislation which was passed at that session, and to which Mr. Benson and I gave our unstinted support was a bill by Dr. Richard S. Hill, of Prince Georges County, appropriating $100,000 for the improvement of the Washington Boulevard. This I know to be the first piece of good-roads legislation in Maryland and almost the pioneer legislation for good roads in this country. Other speakers have mentioned Mr. Benson having served several terms in the house of delegates, was elected to the State senate, and there again, if we should evaluate the various legislative bills passed and which Mr. Benson supported, there would stand out as the most progressive, the most worthy, and the most useful piece of legislative the bill which he introduced providing a good-roads system for Maryland under the administration of Gov. Austin L. Crothers. Under this system millions of dollars have been expended in the State of Maryland upon its road system, so that every section of the State has been connected by improved highways second to none in the land. These highways have given to Maryland an impetus such as no other movement could have done.

Mr. Benson was certainly one of the most forceful leaders of our State; he had a good voice, was of commanding appearance, and always agreeable. It is a great loss to our State to have one of its useful citizens such as was Mr. Benson pass away at such an early age. It is, however, a gratification that he lived long enough to see his family grow up, well educated, and self-supporting. Certainly his great ambition in life was the welfare of his wife and his fine family of boys and girls.

Hon. STEPHEN W. GAMBRILL, Representative from the fifth congressional district of Maryland:

In the death of Carville D. Benson the State of Maryland has sustained a serious loss. As a lawyer he had a fine analytical mind, which had little sympathy with technical obstructions and artifices so often employed by lawyers not so richly endowed as he was with a comprehension of the true purposes of his profession. But it was in the broad field of public life that he found his greatest usefulness. To him public service had an appeal and a fascination, and it was in this service that he displayed a knowledge of statecraft and a personal charm which soon made him one of the outstanding figures of his State.

He was elected to Congress from the second congressional district of Maryland to serve in the Sixty-fifth Congress, and was reelected to and served in the Sixty-sixth Congress.

He performed his duties as a lawmaker with great credit and distinction. He came to Congress well versed in all the intricacies of parliamentary procedure, gained as that knowledge was through conspicuous and notable service in the Maryland House of Delegates from 1904 to 1910, being speaker of the house of delegates in 1906. As a reward for services and work well performed, his constituents sent him to the Maryland State Senate for the sessions of 1912 and 1914, and it was with this knowledge to guide him that he took up his congressional duties.

He was a man of great human qualities, free and approachable, and in all his dealings with others, whether in business or politics, he was at once frank, straightforward, and devoid of dissimulation.

His death is a distinct loss to his State and his wise counsel will be missed in the councils of his political party, for which he had such a deep attachment.

Hon. FREDERICK N. ZIHLMAN, Representative of the sixth congressional district of Maryland:

I learned of the death of Hon. Carville Benson, formerly a Representative from the second congressional district of Maryland, with profound sorrow.

I knew Mr. Benson when he was a Member of the House and served with him in the State senate, and also during his two terms as Member of Congress.

He was a man of unusual courage and was an experienced and able legislator. He was a devoted and loyal friend, and a consistent worker for the advancement of the interest of the people of Baltimore County and of the State.

Maryland loses a conscientious public servant, who was intensely loyal to his native State and its traditions.

Hon. VINCENT L. PALMISANO, Representative of the third congressional district of Maryland:

While I did not have the pleasure and honor of serving in Congress with the Hon. Carville D. Benson, I was associated with him at Annapolis at a time when he represented Baltimore County in the State senate, and I represented Baltimore City in the lower house. Recalling evidences of his ability at that time, and knowing independent of that the character of legislator he was, it is easy for me to say that the State of Maryland has seldom been represented in the State legislature or National Congress by a more able, astute, and capable statesman. By his straightforward manner in dealing with the people he became a leader and was admired by all who knew him.

Mr. Benson was more closely identified with Baltimore County than any other subdivision of his State, and in that county he had a host of friends and admirers and the respect of those practicing the profession of the law and of the judges who presided over the courts. Just as we attempt in life to rebuild the beauties of nature as they fade from our view and await new seasons, just as we by example try to emulate the life of those who have left a record of worth-while service, so will the people of Maryland keep ever before them much of the splendid life of Carville D. Benson. Let us be consoled with the language of the poet:

The leaves die and fade away;
They only wait through wintry hours the coming of the May.

The stars go down to rise upon some fairer shore,
And bright in Heaven's jeweled crown they shine forevermore.

An angel form walks o'er the earth with silent tread;
It bears our best-loved things away and then we call them dead.

RECESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to move that the House take a recess, subject to the call of the Speaker, in order that the electoral vote may be counted. After that function is over, Calendar Wednesday business will be called, the Committee on Territories being the committee now on call.

In accordance with House Resolution 294, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now take a recess, subject to the call of the Speaker.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House stood in recess, subject to the call of the Speaker.

AFTER RECESS

At 12 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE

At 1 o'clock p. m. the Doorkeeper, Mr. Bert W. Kennedy, announced the Vice President of the United States and the Senate of the United States.

The Senate entered the Hall, preceded by their Sergeant at Arms and headed by the Vice President of the United States and the Secretary of the Senate, the Members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

The Vice President took his seat as the presiding officer of the joint convention of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying the chair on his left.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the Congress, the Senate and House of Representatives, pursuant to the requirements of the Constitution and laws of the United States have met in joint session for the purpose of opening the certificates and ascertaining and counting the votes of the electors of the several States for President and Vice President. Under well-settled precedents the reading of the formal portion of the certificates will be dispensed with unless demand therefor shall be made. After it is ascertained that the certificates are authentic and correct in form, the tellers will count and make a list of the votes cast by the electors of the several States.

In accordance with precedents, the Chair suggests that there should be no manifestation of approval or disapproval on the part of the galleries or on the part of the members of the joint session as the counting proceeds.

The tellers heretofore appointed will take their places at the desk.

The tellers, Mr. SHORTRIDGE and Mr. KING, on the part of the Senate, and Mr. GIFFORD and Mr. JEFFERS, on the part of the House, took their places at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hands to the tellers the certificates of the electors for President and Vice President of the State of Alabama, and they will count and make a list of the votes cast by that State.

Mr. JEFFERS (one of the tellers). Mr. President, the certificate of the electoral vote of the State of Alabama seems to be regular in form and authentic, and it appears therefrom that Alfred E. Smith, of the State of New York, received 12 votes for President, and Joseph T. Robinson, of the State of Arkansas, received 12 votes for Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Chair will omit in the further procedure the formal statement just made, and will open in alphabetical order the certificates showing the votes of the electors in each State, and the tellers will read, count, and announce the result in each State as was done with respect to the State of Alabama.

There was no objection.

The tellers then proceeded to read, count, and announce, as was done in the case of Alabama, the electoral votes of the several States in an alphabetical order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Gentlemen of the Congress, the certificates of all the States have now been opened and read, and the tellers will make final ascertainment of the result and deliver the same to the Vice President.

The tellers delivered to the Vice President the following statement of the result:

The undersigned, SAMUEL M. SHORTRIDGE and WILLIAM H. KING, tellers on the part of the Senate, and CHARLES L. CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

AUTHORIZING CERTAIN PAYMENTS BY THE TREASURER OF ALASKA

The Clerk called the committees; and when the Committee on the Territories was called—

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 4257, on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the bill S. 4257, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4257) to authorize the payment of certain salaries or compensation to Federal officials and employees by the treasurer of the Territory of Alaska

Be it enacted, etc., That any salaries to United States officials or employees of the United States Government in Alaska appropriated by the Alaska Territorial Legislature, session of 1927, may be paid to such United States officials or employees of the United States by the treasurer of Alaska up to and including the date of March 31, 1929, any Federal law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That subsequent to March 31, 1929, all appropriations by the Alaska Territorial Legislature shall be in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, entitled "An act to create a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes," and amendments thereto.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a sequence to a bill that was defeated on the floor of the House on the 5th of March last. Up in the Territory of Alaska an unusual situation has arisen by reason of the fact that the Territorial legislature has imposed many duties on Federal officials illegally, in violation of the provisions of the enabling act of the Territory. This has gone on for some years, although the legislature has been warned repeatedly that they should desist in the practice. Finally a suit was brought in the court at Juneau to enjoin the Territorial treasurer from paying these salaries, in addition to the regular salaries from the Government.

A bill was introduced last winter for the relief, not of the Territory but for the relief of the Federal officials. That bill provided for the repeal of a portion of the enabling act which would fix the situation whereby Federal officials might administer the Territorial administrative government permanently. They proposed to repeal all restrictions placed on Federal officials. That bill was defeated on the floor of the House; Members may recall that it was up under suspension of the rules and failed by a vote of 130 to 12.

The injunction order extended only to the secretary of the Territory, who was receiving $2,000 from the Territory in addition to $3,600 from the Federal Government.

He continued to perform the services without receiving the salary for a period of almost two years. The people felt that he should continue, for if he gave up the work entirely a chaotic condition would prevail in the administration of Territorial affairs.

So he kept on performing the services for nearly two years. This bill would permit the treasurer of the Territory to pay him the salary which he has earned honestly.

The bill also provides that the practice of employing Federal officials to do the work of the Territory officials shall cease. The man undoubtedly is entitled to the money. It was not his fault, but was the fault of the Territorial legislature, as is shown in the report of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows that a similar bill was before the House, and some of the friends of Alaska—and Alaska has a good many friends, sincere friends, on the floor of the House—and we went to the rescue of Alaska, and under a suspension of the rules we defeated that bill. Now the gentleman comes in here and seeks to destroy the action of the House on that bill by permitting this to pass. When this man took office he knew that he could not draw two salaries, and the gentleman is establishing a dangerous precedent for his Territory.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to express my thanks to the gentleman from New York in helping us defeat the vicious measure of last March, for it was a vicious measure. The provisions of this bill are such that the Territorial legislature will desist, and if they should continue they can not ask relief from the Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Are there other Federal officials drawing salaries from the Territory?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. What class?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Secretary to the governor of the Territory. I can not enumerate all who are receiving a salary, but I know the secretary of the governor of the Territory is receiving additional salary, and I am assured by lawyers in the Territory that it is absolutely illegal and ought to be stopped.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. This does not apply to the judiciary, the judges, or the district attorney?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; presumably they would not be permitted to receive it. Here is the situation. The Federal officials in Alaska are a very powerful influence politically, and they have been able to dominate the legislature. They are aided in that by the press of the capital city of Juneau. The press seems to be under the domination of the Federal officials, and when any measure of a progressive nature, any measure along the lines of establishing a better American ideal of government, comes before the legislature the press of Alaska is opposed to it. Perhaps I should qualify that by saying the press of the capital city. These men coming down to the capital are naturally afraid of the press. I think there is a general fear of the influence of the press among statesmen of greater standing than those of our local legislators in Alaska. That is the whole trouble. The press and the Federal officials combined to place the control of Territorial affairs in the hands of the Federal officials, and that control is lodged there now.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. My experience with the Territory of Alaska is that those people up there have been clamoring for a good many years for a greater measure of self-government—not only the people of the Territory, but the legislature and even the press itself. How do they expect the American Congress and the American people to grant them a greater measure of self-government than they have now, when they attempt to surrender what they already have as they are doing, it seems to me, to a large extent by asking for the passage of such legislation as this?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have to admit, although it is somewhat humiliating, that the gentleman from Mississippi raises a good point; but I say that it is not the will of the people of the Territory of Alaska that these conditions exist. It is simply weakness upon the part of our legislators in contact with the strong influence of Federal officials and the press of the capital city.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If by the passage of this Senate bill now before the House we established this precedent, what protection will the people have if some of these Federal job holders manage to be elected to the Territorial legislature and then come here and say they were duly elected and served as legislators and want an enabling act so that they could draw two salaries? Is not the gentleman risking turning over his whole local government to these job holders he complains of?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope not. I think I can assure the gentleman that if this practice continues after next March, when the legislature sits, the whole matter will be taken to the courts, and that there will be no relief for these fellows if they accept these salaries and go through with it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would the gentleman be very unhappy if we were to defeat this bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I feel that I owe it to this man who has given his services and who has not received a cent, who is not responsible for the situation, to do what I can to get the relief for him, and I think that the instruction in the bill to the legislature ought to be sufficient.

Mr. DOWELL. And does not this bill legislate that we do not approve of that practice and will not continue it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It expresses the disapproval of the Congress.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Eliminating the personal equation, the personal relation between the Delegate from Alaska and the particular individual involved in this bill, the gentleman will state that he is opposed to the practice.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The practice of relief in cases of this kind?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; I think the practice is wrong, when this thing is done deliberately. I have to admit that the practice of granting relief by Congress is wrong; but, at the same time, I reassert that this man was not responsible for it, that it was the legislature.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is acting out of the wholesomeness and the bigness of his heart rather than being actuated by the usual acute intellect that he displays in this House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. If this bill passes, will it not be establishing a precedent for the passage of legislation of this kind in the future?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think so. I think the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] this morning on this measure will have an influence to prevent a continuation of this thing in the future. And I believe the warning contained in the bill ought to be sufficient for that.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Alaska knows, and I think he will admit, that the people of the Territory of Alaska have not had any better friend in this House than I am. I have been there and I have studied their conditions and I have done everything I could to try to give them a greater measure of control over their local affairs, but if they are going to indorse legislation of this kind and attempt to turn the Territory back to the United States, I would like to know what encouragement it will be to those of us who have been trying to help them to continue to fight their battles in the future.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The point is very well taken. At this time I want to express my appreciation of the help of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], which he has always given me in the Committee on Territories in any measure that seemed beneficial to the Territory of Alaska, and that would extend local self-government further, and I say the same of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. Ever since he has been here he has always supported every progressive measure for the Territory that ever came up on the floor of the House. I do not know that I want to be in the position of apologizing to him for the passage of a bill of this kind. Nevertheless I appreciate the way he feels about it. He rendered yeoman service in the defeat of that other vicious bill, and now he feels that we are attempting to accomplish almost the same thing in this measure. I do not take that view of it.

Mr. ARENTZ. How many departments and bureaus, and so forth, are operating in Alaska in the government of that Territory at the present time?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the administration of Territorial affairs?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is pretty difficult for me to say.

Mr. ARENTZ. How many activities in administration are being done by the people of Alaska themselves?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Virtually none.

Mr. ARENTZ. Now, it seems to me that pride alone, pride of men who have been there since the gold rush of 1898, would be a sufficient motive to cause them to run their own country and to do everything they possibly could to eliminate the various bureaus and administrations that are running every solitary affair that is run in Alaska.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The gentleman is right. I want to say for the men who were in the gold rush of 1898, they are the men who are opposed to this, but with the advent of the bureaus have come a great many people of the States who are new to the Territory and are unacquainted, and they are in many cases employed by the bureaus, while others come under the bureau influence, and many are guided somewhat by a reactionary press that is committed to the policies of the bureaus and the exploiting interests. I do not want Members of this House to understand that the majority of the people of the Territory are in favor of present conditions; in fact, a large majority would be just the other way.

Mr. IRWIN. I understand the gentleman is against this kind of legislation, but he does honestly believe this man has earned it and ought to be paid.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. IRWIN. And the gentleman has given this matter considerable consideration, and the gentleman desires this to be a warning to the officials of the Territory?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope this will be a warning to the officials of the bureaus of the Territory, that if they expect to get more money out of the Territorial treasury illegally they will get no relief whatsoever if they are enjoined in court, and I am sure they will be.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. These Federal officials who are getting salaries from the Territorial Legislature are performing some regular duties, are they not, for the Territory?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. They are not engaged in Federal duties?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, sir; they have rendered service for the money received.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. That is the question; I do not know what the duties are, but why can not they be permitted to perform both duties? If they are doing work legally, why should they not be paid for it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, they are doing it illegally.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will.

Mr. SCHAFER. Could not that be done by employing people to do this work who are not employed by the Federal Government?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly; but, of course, the Federal officials prefer to take the money and do the work.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is the gentleman in favor of this bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; I am in favor of it.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will say the gentleman has always been advocating before this Congress that more power should be given to the Territorial government in Alaska, but what if Congress should give more power, the facts the gentleman has brought out seem to indicate they are disposed to give over to Federal officials the powers they have already received from Congress?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This gives them $2,000 more power.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I can not make a reply to the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin under the circumstances. He is absolutely right in what he has just said.

Mr. PERKINS. I am almost persuaded to vote for anything for which the gentleman is in favor, but would not the better way to discourage such practices be by defeating this bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; I do not think so. I think the local legislature should be given a chance to redeem itself without depriving the secretary of the $4,000 he has honestly earned.

Mr. DOWELL. As a matter of fact, this man was employed under the provisions of the Legislature of Alaska, and he performed the services, and, except for the fact that it was learned later that he was not legally entitled, he would have been paid. Yet it is a fact that he earned the money and should receive it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Did he receive his pay from the Federal Government covering the same period of time for which he is asking pay under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. He received $3,600 a year from the Federal Government. Formerly he received more than that, but when the Secretary of the Interior learned that he received $2,000 a year from the Territory his Federal salary was cut to $3,600.

Mr. SCHAFER. Was all his time occupied in the working hours for the Federal Government?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. During the same day, possibly at different hours, these duties were performed.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that if we pass this bill we will send notice out to the Federal officials in Alaska that they shall continue in the future as in the past and usurp the whole functions of the Alaskan Territorial government?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. A proviso has been inserted in the bill to this effect:

Provided, That subsequent to March 31, 1929, all appropriations by the Alaska Territorial Legislature shall be in conformity with the provisions of the act approved August 24, 1912, which is the enabling act for Alaska.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Why is that necessary? This is a warning. Let me suggest that the best way to warn these people up there is not to vote the money.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think they will be warned.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I understood I was to be yielded 10 minutes by the gentleman from Iowa. If permitted, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules the gentleman is not permitted to yield.

Mr. LANKFORD. Will the gentleman give me 10 minutes?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia is the ranking member of the committee, and it was my purpose to give him 10 minutes to use as he desires, if that is proper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? Without objection, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] yields 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] to be in turn yielded by him as he may desire.

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes, not on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment in order that I may ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing a clipping from an Alaskan paper?

Mr. LOWREY. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alaska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a clipping from an Alaskan paper. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the clipping referred to:

[From the Alaskan of January 18, 1929]

That Juneau, the capital of the Territory, is the hotbed of the bureaucrats in Alaska there is none to deny. The real Alaskans residing there have been so long under the iron heel of Federal officials who swarm around there that the Alaskans not imported have become servile condoners of all the conspiracies concocted by the bureaucrats to rob the Territory.

Whenever the imported stock ask for a little additional salary to be paid by the Territory in violation of law, these Juneau people smile serenely and say "Thank you."

They have peddled out Territorial offices to legislators for a surrender of our personal rights as American citizens until there is nothing but the shell left to the organic act, our Territorial constitution. So familiar have voters of the first division become with this deplorable condition of political affairs in the capital city a resident of Juneau, nominated for a public office, is heavily handicapped as a candidate, for the people of the first division well know that the Alaskans residing in Juneau long ago became servile sycophants of the imported Federal bureaucrats and offer no resistance to their conspiracies to bleed the Territorial treasury and domineer over our legislative officials.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, we have just finished counting the presidential vote. As some of us expected, the Republicans have counted Al Smith out. The Democrats, you know, as far back as I can remember, have been charged with being experts in counting the vote. They used to say that we believed in a fair ballot and a free count. [Laughter.] It is also asserted that some people said we were in favor of a free ballot and a free count. We at least admit that Democrats have always been ardent advocates of full and absolute freedom.

After the vote was finished to-day I gave a good Republican friend of mine a little lesson in American history, which was appreciated, and then it was suggested that I give this lesson to the House. Away back yonder in the days of better public morals and better public ideals, Grover Cleveland was elected President of the United States in a Democratic landslide, and the Memphis Commercial Appeal came out the following day with these headlines:

[Laughter.]

But four years later there was as great a landslide to the Republicans, and the Democrats were completely snowed under, and the same Memphis Commercial Appeal came out with similar headlines—

Heaven and Mississippi still stand by the Democracy.

[Laughter.]

I simply wanted to rise and call this House to witness that history still repeats itself, and heaven and Mississippi still stand for the Democracy. [Laughter.]

A friend over here inquires in an undertone, "How about Massachusetts?" When so unexpected a thing happens as that Mississippi and Massachusetts get together, it is such a good combination that it ought not to be interfered with. That is something that ought to be allowed to grow.

Mr. SCHAFER. And Mississippi still stands by the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes, sir. And will continue to do so regardless of all political parties and all political candidates.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, may I have three minutes?

Mr. DOWELL. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat surprised to hear the ranking Democrat on the committee say he will vote for this bill. I am very fond of the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He ably represents his people here at all times. But I can not conscientiously support this legislation.

You know we start by setting precedents here which ultimately develop into policies which are detrimental to the welfare of American institutions, and I am afraid that if I should sanction the passage of this bill, even impliedly by sitting silently by, it would rise up to smite me in the future when I shall most assuredly attempt to prevent a repetition of the passage of such legislation as this.

I have never seen in all my career finer men or finer women or more noble citizenship that I find in the Territory, strong in intelligence, virile, forceful people. I should like to see them building up there a community spirit, a local spirit, if you please, a spirit of patriotic devotion to Alaska, assuming charge of and responsibility for the conduct of their public affairs.

That has been my attitude ever since I have been a member of the Committee on Territories, and I do not feel now like receding from that position merely to pass one bill which is contrary to my ideas touching legislation of this kind. My objections to it have been brought out in this debate, and I sincerely trust that this legislation will not pass.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I agree with my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and I join with him in protesting against this measure. I shall vote against it.

Every Member of this House has the utmost confidence in the judgment of the Delegate from Alaska. He not only represents the views and the ideals of the people of his Territory but in his charming and attractive personality typifies the rugged, honest manhood which settled that great country. [Applause.] I appreciate the predicament and the embarrassment of our colleague from Alaska. He took this floor some time ago, and in one of the ablest appeals ever made in the House of Representatives defeated, decisively and overwhelmingly, under suspension of the rules, a bill which embodied the very principle contained in the bill now before the House for consideration. But, gentlemen, we must go to his rescue. He is in exactly the same position as many of us are when through personal appeals, friendship, and contact, we introduce a private bill that we are absolutely ashamed of; we bring it on the floor of the House and make a feeble attempt to support it, knowing it should be defeated and hoping for a miracle to happen. Of course, gentlemen, you can not eliminate entirely the personal equation. The gentleman from Alaska naturally knows the secretary of the Territory. The secretary of the Territory says to him, "Now, look here; you defeated the bill which would have permitted these other fellows to get their extra pay; but I will tell you what I want you to do for me; introduce a bill so that I will get mine." Why, gentlemen, what are we doing here? After having stated by an overwhelming vote that we would not permit the practice of having Federal job holders to receive pay from the Territory, thereby serving in a dual capacity and receive two pays, we are now asked to pass upon a bill which will give this privilege to one individual who has been selected and singled out. Why, the very bill itself is stultifying. After providing for the payment of the dual salary for this man, we say, "Oh, this bill is only good up to March 31, 1929, and if you come back hereafter we are not going to permit it any more."

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think that if the Secretary of the Interior took into consideration the fact, when he fixed this man's salary, that he was being paid this additional salary that would add some merit to this proposition?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But it was unlawful.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The Delegate from Alaska stated that the Secretary of the Interior, in fixing the salary, had taken this into consideration.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But any such consideration is unlawful, just as if we were to fix the salary of a Federal judge or United States marshal at so much and then say "We will fix the salary of the United States marshal in the next county at so much because as sheriff of that county he receives an additional salary." We can not take an unlawful proposition into consideration.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. In taking the last census for Alaska, Federal employees were placed upon two pay rolls for the same period of time and this Congress passed a bill approving the disbursement for their salaries. I think the last paragraph of this bill will serve notice on the officials that they can not expect any such relief from Congress in the future.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If that is the purpose of the bill it is something new in legislation, the fact that we have to serve notice of an existing law, because all this bill does is to reiterate existing law. I have never heard of anything in legislation which served notice on officials of existing law and that such a law is on the statute books.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Does this bill provide for anything worse than the usual practice of going ahead and doing something that is wrong and then coming to Congress for the validation of something that has already been done.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is what we are doing here.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is what they do in the matter of presenting claims.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And that is what we are doing here and I say it is wrong. This bill ought not to pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself five minutes.
Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. DOWELL. Yes.
Mr. PERKINS. Under the present law two salaries can not be paid to one individual performing two functions?
Mr. DOWELL. The court has so held. The Legislature of Alaska, however, when they made this arrangement of consolidating the Federal office with the Territorial office, did not have that information. The court has made that determination since that time.
Mr. PERKINS. What effect has the bill other than to say that hereafter they will have to obey the law which was enacted August 24, 1912?
Mr. DOWELL. The exception which I will try to explain.
The gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY], who is chairman of this committee and unfortunately is quite ill and unable to be present, has asked me to take up this bill in his absence and present it to the House, and I am presenting it on his behalf because he is interested in its passage and has felt that a great injustice will be done an employee unless the bill is passed.
Now, here is the situation as I understand it: The Territory of Alaska, by its legislature, believing it had the right to do it, employed some of the Government employees there and paid them a salary out of the funds of the Territory. That was done in this case, and the court held that under the law they had no right to do it. This man was employed by the Government, and his salary out of the Public Treasury was reduced because the Territory of Alaska was to pay him $2,000 per year. He was only receiving $3,600 from the Government, because that office had been consolidated with the Territorial office.
The court has determined that the Territory of Alaska had no right to consolidate these offices, and this man has served his term, rendered the service, and this bill is for the purpose of paying this man.
Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DOWELL. Yes.
Mr. UNDERHILL. This has been done repeatedly, and at almost every Private Calendar reading several cases of a similar character are passed by the House without an objection on the part of anyone.
Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, not of similar character.
Mr. UNDERHILL. Well, why not?
Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say that many bills of as little merit pass the House, but not of similar character.
Mr. UNDERHILL. They are to pay employees of the Government who are drawing one salary for services rendered in another capacity, where they have rendered the service, delivered the goods, and the Government is morally bound to pay them for the services rendered.
Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; but they do not involve the fundamental principle of receiving two salaries from two different sources, the Territorial government and the Federal Government.
Mr. DOWELL. As a matter of fact, the Federal Government received the benefit of this, and this bill is merely to permit the Territory of Alaska to pay what they agreed to pay. As I understand, this man's salary was reduced as a Federal employee.
Mr. CLAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DOWELL. Yes.
Mr. CLAGUE. What was he receiving before his salary was reduced?
Mr. DOWELL. I do not know the amount.
Mr. RANKIN. Some one ought to be able to answer that question.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not sure of the exact amount, but the salary of the secretary of the Territory of Hawaii is $5,400. Under the system our secretary has been working in Alaska he was receiving $5,600, $200 more a year, from both the Federal Government and the Territorial government. I assume when this salary from the Territory is shut off the Secretary of the Interior will have to raise his salary to $5,400, or somewhere near that, to correspond with the salary of the secretary of Hawaii.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa has used five minutes.
Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I will yield myself more time.
Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DOWELL. Yes.
Mr. GIBSON. These services were performed when it was legal to pay the secretary the $2,000 out of the Territorial fund?
Mr. DOWELL. It was supposed to be legal and was legal until the court determined that they had no right to do it.
Mr. GIBSON. But the services were performed when it was legal; that is, before the court had determined that.
Mr. DOWELL. Yes.
Mr. GIBSON. So there is a moral obligation, to say the least, resting on the Government to pay this amount.
Mr. DOWELL. I think so.
Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DOWELL. Yes.
Mr. PERKINS. Is not the effect of this proposed legislation to repeal the decision of the court in this particular case?
Mr. DOWELL. Well, you may construe it in that way.
Mr. PERKINS. In other words, the court determined that under the act of August 24, 1912, that they had no right to employ this man.
Mr. DOWELL. Yes.
Mr. PERKINS. And now we are saying, "You may pay him but hereafter you will not be able to do it."
Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DOWELL. Yes.
Mr. UNDERHILL. But the court decides upon the law and not upon the equities of the case.
Mr. DOWELL. And while he believed he was being legally employed——
Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DOWELL. Yes.
Mr. LAGUARDIA. That being so, would not the proper procedure be to bring in a bill here for the relief of this gentleman and let us pay him the difference?
Mr. DOWELL. Yes; we might do it in that way, but we have the matter clearly before us now, and if he is entitled to this pay he ought to receive it, and if he is not entitled to it he ought not to receive it. It seems to me, gentlemen, when we get down to the question here, he is entirely an innocent employee who believed that the Territory of Alaska had the right to employ him; believed they had the right to consolidate the duties of these officers, and he performed these duties.
Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield a bit further?
Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.
Mr. PERKINS. This is a general act and applies to any salaries due to any employees?
The bill says—

any salaries to United States officials or employees of the United States Government in Alaska—

And so forth.
Mr. DOWELL. But it only applies to the one.
Mr. PERKINS. Now, I wonder about that. I spoke to the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and I am under the impression he said it might apply to a good many.
Mr. DOWELL. No; I think it applies to only one.
Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for me to ask that question?
Mr. DOWELL. I yield on that question to the gentleman from Alaska.
Mr. PERKINS. Then I would like to ask the gentleman from Alaska if this does not apply to more than one or may apply to more than one?
Mr. SUTHERLAND. The action in the court was applied to only one individual, the secretary of the Territory.
Mr. DOWELL. That was in the construction of the law.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. There was a suit to enjoin a number of other cases, but the court never got to render a decision on the others for the reason that the judge passed away while the case was pending. So there has never been a decision with regard to the others.
Mr. DOWELL. But it only applies to one.
Mr. LAGUARDIA. The bill says that—any salaries to United States officials or employees of the United States Government in Alaska may be paid to certain officials—

And so forth.
Mr. DOWELL. Some years ago the chairman of the committee [Mr. CURRY] introduced a bill upon which there was extensive hearings by the committee for the consolidation of the work of many of the Federal departments of the Government in the Territory of Alaska. There is no doubt, it seems to me, that there is a great need for some consolidation of the work in that Territory, and I am hoping that there will be a consolidation of some of these Federal activities in the Territory, and I believe we will get as good service and save a great deal of money to the Government of the United States. I believe it can be done, I believe that the chairman of the committee when he returns to his work—which I hope may be soon—will be glad to take up that work.
Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DOWELL. I yield.
Mr. RANKIN. If you are attempting in the bill to relieve one individual, why do you not say so in the bill and limit it to that individual case?

Mr. DOWELL. The Delegate from Alaska explained the situation.

Mr. RANKIN. In other words, you will be doing this—that instead of relieving one man you are throwing open the floodgates for other fellows to creep in.

Mr. DOWELL. No; this closes the door.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I want to ask the gentleman why it would not be better to clean up these old cases than to have them coming back here one by one?

Mr. RANKIN. Members of the House have understood that this was merely to relieve this individual case, but at this late period in the debate it develops that the floodgates are to be opened to others who may want to get in under it. I do not think the bill ought to pass at all. It is virtually the same bill that Congress defeated a year ago.

Mr. DOWELL. No; the gentleman is not correct. The bill at the last session merely continued the situation as heretofore.

Mr. RANKIN. This comes along and wipes out the decision of the court in favor of possibly a great multitude of these claimants.

Mr. DOWELL. I think the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi is not correct. It is true that the bill recognizes the decision of the court, which was not known to anyone until the court rendered the decision. Congress recognizes the decision of the court and holds that hereafter none of these offices shall be consolidated with the Territory office.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman admits that it does not limit the application of the bill to any one man.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is no relief required for others because they received their salaries and the treasurer of the Territory has not been enjoined. They now know what the decision of the court is and they will not go beyond this Territorial legislature for they know that they will be enjoined, and there will be no relief. I think they know the attitude of Congress and the attitude of the courts.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand, all the other officials have been paid.

Mr. RANKIN. How does the gentleman know?

Mr. DOWELL. Because I have great confidence in the Delegate from Alaska.

Mr. RANKIN. How does the Delegate know?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Because I know that the others have received their pay.

Mr. DOWELL. There is no way to get it back. This man has earned his pay and he ought to have it. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I have a preferential motion.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from New York has not the floor.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAPES). The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Territories.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Territories.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA) there were 15 ayes and 32 noes.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. DOWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, that is all from the Committee on the Territories.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will continue the call of the committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on Insular Affairs.

RATIFYING AMENDMENT TO CORPORATION LAW OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 16881, to approve, ratify, and confirm an act of the Philippine Legislature entitled "An act amending the corporation law, act No. 1459, as amended, and for other purposes," enacted November 8, 1928, approved by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands December 3, 1928.

The SPEAKER, pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the bill H. R. 16881, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of the Philippine Legislature entitled "An act amending the corporation law, Act No. 1459, as amended, and for other purposes," enacted November 8, 1928, approved by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands December 3, 1928, be, and the same is hereby, approved, ratified, and confirmed.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 30 minutes to the Commissioner of the Philippine Islands [Mr. GUEVARA].

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, I consider myself fortunate in having a share in the discussion of the bill now under consideration, to ratify and validate all the provisions of the law enacted by the Philippine Legislature in its last regular session, introducing amendments to the corporation law of the Philippine Islands.

These amendments place a new instrument of progress in the hands of the people. They lay down the principle of free investment necessary to the development of commercial and trade freedom. They also strengthen credit which is essential to commerce and industry.

These amendments also constitute a friendly gesture on the part of the Filipino people toward capital, and discredit, once and for all, their supposed unfriendly attitude toward investment. The Philippine Legislature, in enacting any legislation takes into consideration, like any other legislative body, local conditions and the needs and idiosyncracies of the people for whose benefit and protection it is enacted. No legislative body can depart from this fundamental principle of legislation. To enact a law which is not calculated to meet the loyal support of the people because it does not respond to their needs and inclination, is something that is foreign to democratic institutions which are the source of inspiration of all wise and just legislation.

These are the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why the corporation law of the Philippine Islands was not substantially amended during its existence of almost 23 years. But now local conditions in the islands have greatly changed through the growth of communication facilities, trade, commerce, industry, and agriculture. And now that investment is searching every nook and corner of the country to bring about the wealth that nature has hidden in its virgin soil, it is the duty of the legislature to enact laws, not only to encourage such investment but also to protect it. But the Philippine Legislature has not limited itself to enacting laws for the encouragement and protection of investment alone but has also provided measures to protect the public from unnecessary and wasteful exploitation.

The amendments to the corporation law of the Philippine Islands enacted by the Philippine Legislature in its last session, and to be ratified now by the Congress of the United States, through the bill now under consideration, has aroused a great deal of interest in public opinion, which proves that the people are conscious of the needs and difficulties of the present time. In the earnest desire of the Filipino people, and of their representatives in the legislature, to build an economic structure more in harmony with the requirements of modern commerce and trade, quite considerable opposition was registered against some of the amendments of the corporation law. The opposition was based on (a) sincere desire to ascertain whether the interests of the people would be duly safeguarded, and (b) partisan opposition, criticizing that which they themselves would have done had they been in the position of responsibility in the legislature. For the latter I plead forgiveness; for the former, I wish to say that their interests have been duly safeguarded and protected in the enactment of the amendments to the corporation law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to examine briefly the provisions of the amendments to the corporation law, to be ratified by the Congress of the United States through the bill now under consideration.

The amendments introduce in our corporation law the right of a corporation to issue stocks or shares, with or without par value, following the principle governing these cases now in practice in the United States and all over the world.

This amendment has been strongly criticized on the ground that the no-par-value stock is or may be the source of continuous fraud. The opposition almost instilled in the public mind that the authorization to issuing no-par-value stock by the corporation is an authority given to speculators to exploit the country. Those who speak thus do not even realize that the public is often misled by the sale of stock with par value, thereby cheating the innocent investors, who are frequently persuaded by speculators to purchase stock which sells at a nominal price upon the assurance that the stock is worth much more than they are paying for it. Commercial experience has demonstrated that many a man or woman, uninitiated in the intricacies of financial ventures, has been induced to buy worthless stock for a few dollars which carries a face value of $100 or more. It is easy under these circumstances for the swindler to convince his victim that a real bargain is being offered and that the stock will soon be brought to par or more than par. Also those who have criticized the authority granted to corporations to issue stock with no par value have not considered, or do not want to consider, that it will permit much greater flexibility and accuracy in accounting procedure, since there are a number of satisfactory methods for carrying such issues on the balance sheet.

The opposition to the amendment, as regards the no-par-value stock, has even infected some of the distinguished legal minds in the Philippine Islands, who could not have any other apology for supporting such opposition than having been nursed by the old and stale school of thought. The opposition to this new system introduced in the Philippine corporation law has given rise more to academic discussion than to practical reasoning. But the Philippine Legislature, composed of men of broad vision and knowledge of the modern principles of trade and commerce, wisely and justly rejected such opposition and adopted the system of authorizing corporations to issue stock with no par value.

It is important to note that whether or not corporations are authorized by law to issue stock with or without par value, the fact is that their credit in the market and their standing in the public confidence are the best guaranty of the stability of their stock. The old corporation law of the Philippine Islands did not authorize corporations to issue stock or shares with no par value. This system has to some extent weakened credit in the Philippine Islands, for there are many instances in which a man buying stock has been disappointed, if not swindled, for in buying the stock he did not investigate the financial status of the corporation, blindly accepting the face value of the stock.

Also the single system authorized by the old corporation law of the Philippine Islands, as to the issue of stock or share with par value, has given rise to the evil of stock watering. Furthermore, one of the advantages of the no-par-value stock is that the holder is free from the liabilities to assessment, sometimes confronting the holder of the par-value stock, which has not been fully paid, or the nature of the payment about which serious objections in times of financial difficulties are often raised.

I am making this analytical exposition of the advantages of the no-par-value stock, in order to enlighten the mind of those of my countrymen from the misleading arguments advanced against this system in the aftermath of the approval of the law now to be ratified by the Congress of the United States. And to those of my countrymen who insist upon making political capital out of this question, I wish to say, that they owe to their country the service of their mental integrity which should be inspired by their patriotism.

I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the explanatory notes prepared by the joint committee on banks and corporations of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Philippine Islands, which is, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXPLANATORY NOTE OF REVISED AMENDMENTS

The fundamental idea underlying the proposed amendments to the corporation law is to place our corporations on a certain level with American corporations so that they may enjoy the same advantages that American corporations doing business in the Philippines are allowed to enjoy both under American and Philippine laws. In other words, the proposed amendments are intended to remove the handicaps placed on Philippine corporations when competing with American corporations doing business in the Philippines. These amendments are primarily designed to benefit Philippine corporations and Philippine business rather than American corporations and American business.

The additional powers and privileges sought to be conferred on Philippine corporations under the proposed amendments are now available to American corporations under American laws. So that, while American corporations doing business in the Philippine Islands may issue stocks without par value, and may declare stock dividends, Philippine corporations also doing business here are not allowed to do the same thing, or, at least in the case of stock dividends, it is doubtful whether Philippine corporations may legally declare them.

The changes sought to be introduced in our corporation law by the proposed amendments refer specifically to corporate purposes, stock without par value, stock dividends, the disposition of corporate assets, the modification of restrictions as to ownership of stock in agricultural and mining corporations by individuals, and investment companies. The proposed changes do not in any way, manner, or form, alter or affect the present laws with regard to public lands.

SECTION 1. This amendment merely combines two sections of the present law referring to the same subject matter. The amendment does not alter their provisions.

SEC. 2. The purpose of this amendment is to allow the issue of several classes of stock, with such rights, voting powers, preferences, and restrictions as may be provided in the articles of incorporation. Under existing statutes ownership of stock is necessarily coupled with the right to vote, thus precluding the issue of nonvoting preferred stock. Experience in the management of corporate business has shown the convenience of giving to corporations greater elasticity in defining the relative rights of their shareholders and in determining the methods that they may seek to employ in securing proper financing. This power is specially necessary in the reorganization of weak and moribund corporations, as well as of those requiring additional capitalization to enlarge their business.

This amendment authorizes the issue of no-par-value stock. The present corporation law prohibits the issue of stock except for par value. Almost all of the States of the American Union have recognized the advantages of authorizing corporations to issue stock without par value. The value placed on the certificates of stock, which is based on the original capitalization, is very often misleading, as in many instances that actual value of such stock is very far from the actual amount received by the corporation for the same, such difference depending upon the success of the venture. It does away with the evil of stock watering and prevents the sale of below par. Stock manipulation is avoided, for stocks without par value compels investors to examine the real and true condition of the corporation to determine the real value of the shares they desire to purchase.

This amendment will place domestic corporations on the same level with foreign corporations, most of which have the powers sought to be granted by this amendment to domestic corporations under the laws of the States where they have been organized.

Moneyed corporations, such as banks, trust companies, insurance companies, and building and loan associations, are prohibited to issue no-par-value stock under this amendment. The same exception is made in many of the States of the American Union. The reason for this exception is found in the fact that moneyed corporations depend very vitally on the reputation that they enjoy with the general public, and sudden fluctuations in the market value of their stock may produce financial upheavals and panics which may disrupt its own business, as well as that of other organizations dealing with them.

It is an admitted principle of corporate finance that no dividend should be declared out of capital. For this reason the proposed amendment requires that the entire consideration received from the sale of no-par-value stock should be treated as capital and should not be available for distribution as profits.

The provisions in this section referring to no par value stock have been modeled after the statute in force in the State of New York.

SEC. 3, PAR. 2. Under our corporation law corporations may be formed for only one specific purpose. Foreign corporations, however, may engage in the Philippine Islands in various pursuits. The proposed amendment seeks to remedy this anomaly. There does not seem to be any valid reason why corporations may not engage in two or more legitimate business ventures, provided that in so doing they neither stifle wholesome competition, gain an undue advantage over competitors, nor tend to create monopolies in any line of commerce. To prevent the occurrence of these conditions corporations engaged in transportation or communication systems are restricted to their own special line of activity.

With regard to banks and trust companies, the amendment seeks to authorize what is called as departmental banking, to regulate which the amendment provides for the insertion of new articles 147 to 153 in our corporation law, the old sections 147 to 153 having previously been repealed by the insurance law.

PARS. 7 and 8. This amendment determines how the capitalization of corporations issuing no par value stocks should be expressed in the articles of incorporation.

SEC. 4. The amendments to this section seek to conform the form of the articles of incorporation to the modifications provided in the proposed amendments with regard to the purposes, classes of stock, capitalization, etc.

SEC. 5. This amendment fixes an arbitrary value for all no par value stock for the purpose of fixing the fees to be collected upon the filing of the articles of incorporation.

SEC. 6. This amendment is logical consequence of previous amendments.

SEC. 7. This amendment may be divided into two parts.

1. The present law expressly prohibits corporations from conducting the business of buying and selling real estate. This provision is now being violated almost without restriction by companies engaged in the business of subdividing real estate. The restriction is sought to be eliminated by this amendment, provided the corporation is not organized for the purpose of buying lands and selling them at a profit.

2. The present law prohibits a corporation engaged in agriculture or in mining and any corporation organized for any purpose except irrigation from being in any way interested in any other corporation engaged in agriculture or in mining. The provision is maintained in the proposed amendment with regard to corporations engaged in agriculture or in mining. With reference to other corporations, the modification sought to be introduced is treated under the section dealing with "Investment corporations" hereafter to be considered.

The present law also prohibits any member of a corporation engaged in agriculture or in mining from being a stockholder in any other corporation engaged in agriculture or in mining. This provision seems to be unreasonable, for it prevents a bona fide investor from purchasing shares of stock in several agricultural or mining companies purely as a matter of investment, with no desire either to control said corporations or as an indirect way of acquiring the ownership of large tracts of land. The proposed amendment will allow any person to own stock in two or more corporations engaged in agriculture or in mining, provided his stock does not exceed 15 per cent of the total shares of stock of any of the corporations in which he is thus interested, and provided, further, that this interest in said corporations is solely for investment and not for the purpose of bringing about or tending to bring about a combination to exercise control in any of such corporations. This amendment also allows corporations organized for any purpose, except agriculture or mining, to own stock in two or more corporations engaged in agriculture or mining, subject to the same limitations imposed upon natural persons. Corporations are made up of individual stockholders and there would seem to be no valid reason for prohibiting a corporation to acquire what each of its individual members could acquire. This provision would also be made available to agricultural and mining corporations within certain limitations.

The proposed amendment, while allowing investors in good faith to acquire interest in agricultural and mining corporations, imposes clear, definite, and effective restrictions for the double purpose of preventing the control of innumerable corporations by a group of individuals, as well as of safeguarding the policy underlying the present land laws, namely, to promote the distribution of our lands, both public and private, among the greatest number of people. While this amendment will not satisfy the advocates of organized mass production, it will nevertheless bring about the more desired condition of agricultural development by the cooperative effort of investors in good faith in adequately reasonable quantities.

SEC. 8. This amendment will authorize the organization of investment corporations in the Philippine Islands. The present law does not seem to prohibit the organization of companies for the purpose of owning stock or in any way dealing with the shares and securities of any corporation except those engaged in agriculture or in mining. The law, however, is not clear on this point, even with regard to commercial companies, and the present amendment seeks to authorize expressly the organization of said corporations. There is nothing in the present law which would seem to prevent a commercial corporation from acquiring stocks in an agricultural corporation, but it merely provides that a stockholder, whether an individual or a corporation, that already owns stock in an agricultural or mining corporation, shall not be allowed to be in any way interested in any other agricultural or mining corporation. To allow investment corporations within proper limitations to acquire stock in mercantile corporations is the purpose of this amendment.

If individuals are to be allowed to acquire stock in as many corporations as they may choose to invest in, there would seem to be no valid reason to prevent corporations organized by different individuals to acquire stocks in any kind of corporations under exactly the same restrictions and limitations. In fact, the authority with regard to corporations would seem to be more justifiable. It would make practicable the application of fundamental principles now accepted in corporate investment which require the spreading of investments over a wide field with the consequent diversification of risks. The only objection to this scheme might be that it could promote the establishment of monopolies. To guard against this possibility, there are included in this section the provisions of the Federal statutes of the United States against monopolies or combinations in restraint of trade which are accepted as sufficient to check such tendencies.

A proviso has also been inserted to the effect that moneyed corporations such as banks, trust companies, insurance companies, and building and loan associations shall not invest more than 10 per cent of its capital and surplus in stocks of another corporation. This is in line with State statutes found in the United States.

SEC. 9. This amendment authorizes the issue of stock dividends. The present law seems vague and indefinite with regard to the power of a corporation to declare stock dividends. But it is a well-known fact that many corporations in the Philippines have been declaring stock dividends, either for the legitimate purpose of increasing the capitalization from earned surplus, or for the illegitimate purpose of avoiding the payment of the income tax. The amendment will clarify the law on this subject and, while authorizing the declaration of stock dividends, it imposes the following restrictions:

1. That it must be approved by the stockholders representing not less than two-thirds of all stock entitled to vote then outstanding.

These restrictions are considered sufficient to protect all concerned, and whereas it may occur that a small minority may not be in favor of the declaration of stock dividends, which would in effect compel them to invest in stock of the corporation the amount which they are entitled to receive in cash from the profits of the corporation, the injury that may be caused to them can not outweigh the advantages which may accrue to the greater number of stockholders by allowing them to use the net surplus of the corporation for the expansion of the business. Moreover, under the present law the minority stockholders in a corporation are in condition of greater helplessness in this regard, for there is not any provision in our present law which would compel the board of directors, representing only a majority of the shareholders, to declare any dividend at all out of the net surplus of the corporation. With the declaration of the stock dividend the condition of the shareholder in this particular is greatly improved, for whereas in the case when no dividends at all are declared he holds nothing except an expectancy to receive a share in the profits when a stock dividend is declared the shareholder is given a certificate representing an interest in the corporation which he may negotiate.

SEC. 10. The proposed amendment is a logical consequence of the previous amendments in reference to no par value stock.

SEC. 11. The proposed amendment authorizes the amendment of the articles of incorporation with regard to the relative rights of the holders of the different kinds of shares of the corporation. In order to protect the rights of the minority, which may be injured by this action, the proposed amendment grants them the right to receive in cash the actual value of their shares, to be determined in the fair and equitable manner provided in the amendment.

SEC. 12. The proposed amendment changes the present law only as to form, except that it provides expressly the granting of proxies with regard to the particular case referred to in the section.

SEC. 13. The law is not clear as to right of the stockholders of a solvent corporation to dispose of all its assets, nor is there a legal procedure prescribed for carrying out such a purpose. The amendment authorizes a corporation, by the vote of stockholders representing two-thirds of its stock then outstanding and entitled to vote, to sell, lease, exchange, or otherwise dispose of all or substantially all of its assets. Dissenting stockholders are guaranteed the right to recover the actual value of their shares as may be determined in accordance with the procedure outlined in the amendment. The purpose of this amendment is to allow two-thirds of the shareholders of a corporation who desire to transfer the whole business of a corporation as a going concern to be able to carry out said purpose without being hindered by a small minority, who very often may not act in good faith.

SEC. 14. The proposed amendment only affects corporations which have no capital stock, and seeks to prohibit the system of cumulative voting with regard to said corporations; for experience has shown that with regard to said corporations, in view of the frequent absence of a great number of members, small minorities very often availing themselves of this system, are able to elect the whole board of directors.

SEC. 15. This amendment refers to voting trusts. The present law allows individual stockholders to execute voting proxies, which is in effect a power of attorney granted to a certain individual to vote a share of stock. A voting trust agreement is merely a proxy granted by several stockholders of a corporation on the consideration, among others, of their mutual agreement to create the voting trust. The present law is silent as to the right of shareholders to execute agreements for the purpose of establishing a voting trust, but it is the consensus of opinion among lawyers that such agreements are legal and permissible under the present law. As a matter of fact, many voting trust agreements have been executed in the Philippine Islands, the best known being the voting trust created in favor of the Philippine National Bank by the stockholders of the Binalbagan Estate (Inc.). Voting trusts have been found convenient and necessary instruments of corporate managements in order to establish definite and permanent policies, as a condition required by capitalists or banks before they come to the rescue of distressed corporations, with a view to securing competent management thereof. The amendment proposes to clear up the law on this subject, prescribes the procedure to be followed and, at the same time, imposes certain important limitations, as for example, that no voting trust shall be created for the purpose of placing under one management two or more corporations which under the law may not be organized as one corporation by reason of their purposes. The present amendment is permissive and not compulsory. It does not compel any individual stockholder who does not so desire to sign a trust agreement.

SEC. 16. This amendment merely converts section 36 of the corporation law into section 37.

SECS. 17 and 18. The amendments make a readjustment of the numbers of the sections of the law and authorize the dissolution of a corporation and the distribution of all of its assets among its members without the necessity of court action, provided it does not affect the rights of any creditor having a claim against such corporation. Two-thirds of the stockholders is required for this action.

SEC. 19. The proposed amendment deals principally with investment of the stock in certain corporations, and authorizes their payment by installments.

SEC. 20. This new section maintains in full force and effect the provisions of the law prohibiting monopolies and combinations in restraint of trade, and also the integrity of the provisions of the present land laws of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 21. This section is a transitory provision for the purpose of obtaining the approval of the Congress of the United States to the provisions of this measure which may require congressional action, because of their conflict with the Jones Act.

Mr. GUEVARA. I wish to say a few words concerning the entry of American capital into the Philippine Islands. It is not necessary for me to say, for I have done so time and again, that the Filipino people not only welcome American capital but are also moved by the highest spirit of friendship toward it. The Philippines are in need of capital for their economic development. The Filipino people are aware that foreign capital is bound to come to the islands, and if they are to follow the modern trend of national life they can no longer isolate themselves from the outside world. Their preferences must necessarily be for American capital. Its prosperity is the prosperity of the Filipino people, and I consider it a privilege to say that our future and that of our country will be safer with American investors than with any other. American investment has never meant peaceful penetration. It has always been an instrument for friendly cooperation. It is law-abiding and the American Government, founded on humanitarian principles, has never used its power to make of that capital an instrument of oppression. [Applause.]

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. HOOPER. As I understand it, the real purpose of this bill is to liberalize the corporation act in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. HOOPER. And to make it more possible in a business-like way to handle business in those islands?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. HOOPER. Holding corporations are provided for here?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. HOOPER. And investment corporations?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman has recently been reelected as the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. HOOPER. On behalf of the committee I congratulate the gentleman.

Mr. GUEVARA. I thank the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. What particular business interests have been boosting this particular legislation?

Mr. GUEVARA. No particular business has been boosting this bill, but the Philippine Legislature itself, as representing the people of the Philippine Islands, saw fit to modernize the corporation law.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. It was modernized in the Philippine Legislature at the request of some people there who had some particular motive in it?

Mr. GUEVARA. No.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Was it the sugar interests?

Mr. GUEVARA. No; it does not affect the sugar interests at all.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Was it the rubber interests?

Mr. GUEVARA. No; because we have no rubber interests in the islands.

Mr. SCHAFER. The rubber interests have studied the question of planting rubber trees in the Philippine Islands. If this bill is enacted into law, will it remove the limitation that we now have regarding the number of acres of land that one corporation can hold?

Mr. GUEVARA. By no means.

Mr. SCHAFER. And the gentleman does not know of any particular interest or monopoly that is advocating the passage of this bill by Congress, or that has been advocating its passage before the Philippine Legislature?

Mr. GUEVARA. No. I am positive that no special interest is backing this bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. I know that the Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. GUEVARA] has ably represented his people, and that they could not find a better representative. If this bill meets with his approval, I shall certainly not oppose it.

Mr. GUEVARA. I thank the gentleman. It has my approval.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman mind going into detail and giving us a little of the history of the growth of this bill through the Legislature of the Philippines?

Mr. THURSTON. Is it not true that this bill was passed by the insular assembly at the instance of the Governor General?

Mr. GUEVARA. The Governor General recommended the modification of our corporation law. And he was in favor of the passage of this measure.

Mr. THURSTON. Does this bill in any way modify or affect the amount of land that a corporation can hold in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. GUEVARA. No.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. How much land can they hold?

Mr. GUEVARA. Two thousand five hundred acres of land.

Mr. THURSTON. One additional question. Is any measure now pending in the insular assembly which would remove the restrictions of 2,500 acres that a corporation can own?

Mr. GUEVARA. I believe that the working of this amendment will accomplish that end.

Mr. THURSTON. And that is of highly economic importance to the development of the island?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. HOOPER. As reflected by the vote in the assembly of the Philippine Islands, does the gentleman believe that this bill meets with the general approval of the business interests and the business people?

Mr. GUEVARA. Of the people, too, because the business interests represent a minority, but the people as a whole approve this amendment.

Mr. HOOPER. It meets with the approval of both the native and the American population?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman, in addition to being a very able representative of the Philippine Islands, is a distinguished lawyer of the Philippine Archipelago. He is fully familiar with the conditions there. Do I understand that this will help in the commercial development of the islands?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. There was one question I asked that the gentleman did not have an opportunity to answer. I would like to know what opposition there was to the enactment of this bill?

Mr. GUEVARA. As I pointed out, the opposition was based upon the theory that the authority given to corporations to issue stock without par value would make possible the practice of fraud upon innocent investors.

But I believe it is wrong, because the issue of a stock with par value leads to the deceiving of the innocent investor. For instance, if in the market is offered for sale 200 shares of stocks, with par value of $100 each, the innocent investor who does not care to investigate the financial status of the corporation blindly accepts the face value of it and pays $100 for each of such stocks, which probably is not worth 2 cents.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Is it not a fact that the whole theory of the no par value of stock shows that it was adopted for the purpose of preventing fraud on the innocent purchaser, and that is the reason that the no par value stock was adopted throughout the United States?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to ask a question or two for information. Is the stock exchange at Manila similar to that in New York?

Mr. GUEVARA. Oh, no, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Nothing of that sort?

Mr. GUEVARA. Not even a shadow of it.

Mr. HOOPER. Who drafted this law—a commission appointed by the legislature?

Mr. GUEVARA. A committee of the Bar Association of the Philippine Islands, and this committee was composed of prominent lawyers who reported and recommended the amendments to the Governor General, and the Governor General sent a message to the legislature recommending their approval.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUEVARA. I will.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is this bar association composed of Filipino attorneys as well as American attorneys?

Mr. GUEVARA. Ninety per cent Filipinos and 10 per cent Americans.

Mr. HOOPER. And Filipino lawyers had a proportionate part in the representation on the board or commission which drafted the law?

Mr. GUEVARA. They constituted the majority.
Mr. HOOPER. And it meets with their acquiescence?
Mr. GUEVARA. Yes, sir.
Mr. LEHLBACH. Do I understand this bill meets with the approval of the Governor?
Mr. GUEVARA. Yes, sir. I thank you. [Applause.]
Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.
The previous question was ordered.
The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.
A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BOARD OF VISITORS FOR PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 16877) providing for the biennial appointment of the board of visitors to inspect and report on the government and conditions in the Philippine Islands.
The Clerk read the title of the bill.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is on the Union Calendar.
Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?
Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is this a unanimous report from the committee?
Mr. KIESS. Yes.
Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no opposition to the bill in the committee?
Mr. KIESS. No.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?
There was no objection.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be appointed biennially, during the second regular session of each Congress prior to the Seventy-fifth Congress, a board of visitors to the Philippine Islands to investigate the state of the government of such islands, including the economic and social conditions of the people thereof. Each board shall consist of three Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who are Members or Members elect of the next Congress. A vacancy in a board shall not affect the powers of the remaining members to execute the powers of the board. Each board shall select a chairman from among its members. Each board shall cease to exist upon the date of making the report prescribed in section 3.

SEC. 2. The members of a board shall receive no additional compensation for their services as such members; but they shall be reimbursed for necessary expenses, including actual expenses for travel of such members and a clerk, incurred by them in the performance of duties vested in the board. The expenses of a board shall be paid three-eighths from the contingent fund of the Senate and five-eighths from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, upon vouchers signed by the chairman of the board and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, respectively.

SEC. 3. Each board shall make a report to Congress during the first regular session of the Congress succeeding the appointment of its members, which shall contain a statement of the results of such investigation, together with recommendations for appropriate legislative or other action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will be authorized to correct the spelling of the word "effect" on page 2, line 3.
There was no objection.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will also be authorized to correct the spelling of the word "three-eighths," on page 2, line 13.
There was no objection.
Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.
Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is almost identical with the bill which passed the House of Representatives on June 21, 1926. It provides for a board of visitors somewhat similar in character to those already provided by statute for such governmental activities as the Military and Naval Academies. It is not a special investigating commission. It assumes nothing in the nature of a criticism of existing conditions and in no way conflicts with or reflects upon individual investigations which have been or may be made by the executive branch of the Government for its own purposes.

We believe that in view of the responsibility resting upon Congress for the safety, security, and just government of those millions of people who live in the Philippine Islands, and in view of the remoteness of those islands and the difficulty experienced by Members of Congress in obtaining first-hand, personal information regarding the government of the Philippine Islands and the conditions in those islands, it is highly important that there should be a regular biennial official visit made by Members of Congress to gather information and to inspect governmental activities.
It is my opinion that such a board of visitors visiting the islands regularly every two years will serve to allay any fears on the part of residents in those islands that the Congress is likely to neglect their duties to the Philippine Islands. There is no other way in which the citizens of those islands can present their grievances in person before a committee of the Congress without incurring the expense of a long and costly journey.
The practice of sending a board of visitors to West Point and Annapolis at regular intervals has worked admirably. It has served to keep the Congress in constant touch with actual conditions at the academies. The Congress has not waited until serious difficulties arose, and as a result the conduct of the academies has been most satisfactory. In the Philippines no such policy has been followed. It is believed that this has been detrimental to the progress and prosperity of those islands.
The bill makes provisions for carrying out President Coolidge's recommendation contained in his message of December 6, 1927, to the Seventieth Congress, when, in referring to the Philippines, he said:

It would be well for a committee of the Congress to visit the islands every two years.

This legislation has also the indorsement of the Bureau of Insular Affairs of the War Department and is favored by the representatives of the Philippine government.
Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?
Mr. KIESS. Yes.
Mr. SCHAFER. I have been reading section 2. I would like to be informed whether, in the gentleman's opinion, provision is made for only one clerk for the committee. The language of the bill can be construed so as to provide one clerk for each member of the committee.
Mr. KIESS. The intention was to provide for one clerk for the committee.
Mr. UNDERHILL. The word "members" is plural, not singular, and consequently it means the committee and not the individual members.
Mr. JENKINS. Is it not true in your handling of the affairs of Porto Rico that very frequently delegations come from Porto Rico?
Mr. KIESS. Yes; every year.
Mr. JENKINS. Is it not true also that they do not come from the Philippines?
Mr. KIESS. Yes.
Mr. JENKINS. Is not the object of this bill to obtain contact with the Filipinos when it is too expensive for the Filipinos to come here?
Mr. KIESS. Yes. This would give the Filipinos a chance to get in touch with Congress.
Mr. DALLINGER. Is it not a fact that as chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs it is your experience that in every case where people have appeared from the islands, pro or con, any change, the one thing that they have great hope for is that a committee will visit the place and study the conditions on the ground?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.
Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five additional minutes.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. KIESS. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] I will answer yes.
Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KIESS. Yes.
Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. This appears to be rather a little joy ride for Members of Congress. Are you going to appoint similar commissions or committees to visit Hawaii and Porto Rico?
Mr. KIESS. I may say to the gentleman that our particular committee has no jurisdiction over Hawaii or Alaska. They are under the Committee on Territories. Our committee has the Philippines, Porto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Samoa, and Guam.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. We have a representative over in the Philippines. He reports annually to the President, and his report comes to Congress, and the Bureau of Insular Affairs reports to Congress. It seems to me that this is an absolutely useless expenditure of funds, to send Members of Congress over there, because Congress as a whole is not going to listen to the representations of a few men who take a ride over there.

Mr. KIESS. It is going to be a considerable sacrifice to some Members who may be appointed on this committee to go to the Philippines, which will take three months or more out of the year.

I have had an experience recently in Porto Rico after the hurricane. I went down there and personally saw the damage and talked with the people. It had a wonderfully beneficial effect there. It showed those people that Members of Congress were sufficiently interested in them to take the time to go there and travel over the island.

I believe that if this bill is passed and this commission is sent to the Philippines it will bring the Philippine people in closer relations to the people of the United States, and so long as we are going to keep them I think we ought to do everything we can to better our relations.

Mr. SCHAFER. Would it not be a good thing to be sure that at least one member of this committee should be a Member of Congress who favors Philippine independence?

Mr. KIESS. The appointments will be made by the Speaker, and I am sure we all have confidence in him. The bill does not provide that the members shall necessarily be members of the Committee on Insular Affairs. That question was brought up by the committee, and it was the unanimous opinion of the committee that we should not put that restriction in the bill. We do not want anyone to feel that the members of the Committee on Insular Affairs desire to press a bill limiting the membership of the proposed committee to members of the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. THURSTON. Is it not a fact that the War Department recommends this?

Mr. KIESS. Yes. The War Department and the Philippine representatives have urged it for a number of years. The Resident Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. GUEVARA] is here and will speak for the bill later.

Mr. RAGON. I certainly hope this bill will pass unanimously. I think I am one of the early proponents of this measure. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT] and I discussed this bill for some time before he first introduced it several years ago. I think the purpose this bill will serve will meet the commendation of every man on the floor of this House. I am no longer a member of this committee, but having been a member of it for the last six years I feel an abiding interest in the provisions of this bill and its effects on the Philippine Islands.

For years we have had people go to the Philippine Islands. They come back and write syndicated articles for some of the great newspapers, either fighting Philippine independence or espousing the cause of Philippine independence. The result of that propaganda has been to secure the individual opinion of various persons as to conditions existing in the Philippine Islands which, from my own investigation of the question, has proven to be, in nine cases out of ten, an absolute enlargement and all out of proportion to the importance of the thing about which they talk or write.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And those opinions largely depended upon from whom they received the greatest courtesies and entertainment?

Mr. RAGON. Absolutely. I will tell you what I can do. I can meet a man who has made a trip to the Philippine Islands, and before I have talked with him for three minutes I can tell with which crowd he associated while he was there.

Now, it has always been the opinion of the committee bringing out this bill that what we need in Congress is a nonpartisan committee that can go to the Philippine Islands and meet the people, representing all factions, and ascertain their needs. They would know the committee bore an official authority, so that they could come before it and give such information as they had bearing upon the economic and political progress of the islands.

I think it is more important that we send this committee there now than ever before. I do not want to deal with any delicate relations, but I am going to venture this expression here this afternoon, that we have been playing entirely too much politics with the Philippine Islands. It has been too much of a Democratic and a Republican argument for the good of the islands. I can see a certain amount of the criticism that was leveled at the head of the Governor General during the administration of President Wilson might have been just. I can see some of the criticism which was leveled at the head of General Wood was perhaps just. But back of the criticisms of both I think was an unnecessary—and in some instances an ignorant—political motive which prompted them. I do not know but what we could have had better Governors General than either one of those gentlemen, but that is beside the question. However, I do say to men on both sides of this aisle to-day that I do not believe that in the history of the Philippine Islands there has ever been a better condition than exists there to-day under the present Governor General of the Philippine Islands. [Applause.] I have been one who has fought as stubbornly as anyone for the protection of these islands, and these men on the committee know it; but I believe in giving credit where credit is due. And one of the regrets that comes to me is the news that is now published in the columns of the press that perhaps the Philippine Islands is going to lose their present Governor General. He has been a good man. He has the support of all the factions over there. I do hope and trust that when this committee goes over there it will have in view only one thing, and that is to get at those things that are important for the progress of that community. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAGON. There are 12,000,000 people over there. Among them are many poor people. To my mind those islands represent one of the greatest prospects in all the world for a great future, and I think their progress depends upon the sane and sensible view we take here in Congress as to their future.

I have seen some suggestions brought before the Ways and Means Committee recently, and if those suggestions are carried out I say to you they will reflect, in my opinion, to the everlasting shame upon the treatment that America is according the Philippine Islands. [Applause.] I do hope and trust that the Members of Congress will inform themselves upon the great questions that are pending before the Ways and Means Committee with reference to placing a duty upon sugar, cocoa, coconut oil, and so forth, coming from the Philippines. I trust you will study these questions before you lend your support to the placing upon these products tariff rates that will eventuate in the practical starvation of the Philippine Islands.

What these islands need to-day more than anything else, my friends, is capital. There is but one source of capital to which they can look for support, and that is American capital; and I say to you that American capital is timid now because of the uncertain political status of the islands, and whenever you take off the inducement of free entry into American ports of Philippine products you are absolutely going to foreclose forever from the Philippine Islands American capital.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. What about the proposed restriction on the quantity of imports of sugar and other products; would that have the same effect?

Mr. RAGON. I think unquestionably it would.

Mr. UPDIKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. UPDIKE. Does not the gentleman think this bill will tend to establish the confidence of investors in the Philippine Islands when men of authority go over there and interest themselves in the condition of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. RAGON. There is no question about it; and if any tariff changes must be made with respect to the Philippine Islands they ought to at least await the investigation started by this committee.

This committee will serve the same purpose as your committees in Congress. They will investigate, and the information they secure will be first-hand information. It will not come from the unsustained lips of some propagandist or some member of a faction, but your committee will be over there and they will see and will bring back first-hand information.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. Does not the gentleman think the fact that this is to be a continuous committee is very important?

Mr. RAGON. I think so; I have always insisted it should be a continuous committee, and the only objection I see to the present bill is that the committees dies as soon as it makes its report. I think the committee that goes there this year should be the committee to go there two years hence, because the committee going there this year two years hence will see the progress or the lack of progress which has been made in the islands.

Another thing is that this involves a great study of the people, their habits and customs, some of which run back into the centuries, longer than the life of America, and this necessarily entails a great deal of study, and a man must familiarize and acquaint himself with all these things in order to properly understand the Philippine question. If you change the personnel of the committee every two years, then you have a crowd of freshmen on each committee every two years solving the problems of the Philippine Islands. That is one thing which I contend has been the trouble all the time with a solution of the Philippine problems—we have handled them too much with the hands of inexperience.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. There is nothing in the bill to prevent the Speaker from reappointing.

Mr. RAGON. Not a thing; and I hope that the committee that is pressing this bill will keep it fresh in the minds of the administration of the House that they do that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more, and I shall not ask for any further time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for two additional minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make as to the appointment of this committee to handle a matter of so great importance to the Philippine Islands and the Congress, so that we can be sure that the divergent views that are entertained shall be represented on the committee, so that the Congress may have the full benefit of the conclusions which are reached and not have, perhaps, just a reflection of a one-sided opinion or a confirmation of impressions that already exist?

Mr. RAGON. I agree with the gentleman, and I think that is the purpose of the bill, and I think that is in the minds of the proponents of the measure and the Speaker of the House. I think it would be quite unfortunate to put on the committee a solid group of either Republicans or Democrats, and I think, as the gentleman from Wisconsin suggested, it would be an unfortunate thing if all those who are on the committee were unqualifiedly in favor of immediate independence; and, on the other hand, I think it would be quite unfortunate if everybody on the committee was against it.

Whether the Philippine Islands are now ready for independence is beside the question in respect of the issues involved in this bill. So far as I am concerned, my attitude is known in the committee; but I do think that in the absence of any plan to give them independence at any time in the future, that the best step and the most sensible step that this Congress and succeeding Congresses can take, would be to have a committee that would go there and not stay a month, but, if necessary, stay two months; go into the interior of that country; see their products, their natural resources, and then bring back to the Congress some first-hand information upon which we can depend in order to properly legislate for these people. [Applause.]

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I do not like the casual way in which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] referred to the proposed "joy ride" of members of the commission to be appointed by the Speaker. If that is a "joy ride," I took a joy ride to the Republic of Panama, and it was one of the best rides I ever took in my life. I came home more full of information gained in the space of 20 days than I could have gotten at home in my life. The information that I acquired will be useful to me as long as I remain a Member of Congress and the rest of my life. I think "joy rides" of this kind are essential in such matters. A Congressman can go and inform himself about matters of which he has very little knowledge and come back and give that information to Congress; he does more than that, he carries information to his district for which his friends and constituents are truly thirsty.

I have been used to public speaking all my life in one way or another, and I do not believe I was ever able to interest the people in what I said as I did when I came home and told them about the little time I spent in Haiti and on the Isthmus of Panama learning about that great governmental institution, the canal.

The Philippines are an empire; we are legislating for an empire and know shockingly little about it. It extends from near Formosa on the north almost to the great island of Borneo on the south, more than 1,000 miles. It has more than three times as many people as the thirteen Colonies contained when they became the United States of America.

How are we going to find out, how are we going to act intelligently, how are we going to legislate for the benefit of eleven or twelve million human beings unless from time to time Members of the legislative branch of the Government go there and inform themselves about it?

I do not expect to be one of the members of that commission going on the "joy ride," as the gentleman from Missouri calls it. But I want to see Members of this House go there; I want them to get the information first hand that will enable them to go from Luzon on the north to Sulu on the south; I want them to see what I have read about, but of which I know nothing from observation. I want them to come back and tell us what they saw, and I hope there will never be any question when a bill such as this one comes before the House of Representatives upon the part of any person about sending the very best and the very wisest men we can from this body to bring back that information which we need and which the people of the Philippine Islands need so that we may have proper legislation for these people.

There will always be a division in Congress as to whether it was best for the United States to acquire the Philippine Islands, but they are the possessions of the United States to-day, and in all human probability they will be a part of our territory for many and many a long year to come, at least until we are convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt that the people of those islands, so well represented by this able lawyer, the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. GUEVARA], are capable of self-government. [Applause.] We will never cast them adrift until we are satisfied that they will become the prey and victim of nations ready and eager to take up the task where we laid it down. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker and gentleman, in my judgment this is a wise bill, though, as was stated by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON], it may be necessary to amend it in some particulars. It was my pleasure to go to the Philippine Islands not long since. I rode in an automobile from north to south of the island of Luzon. Our people in the United States are trustees, and this Government of ours acts in a measure as a trustee for the Philippine Islands. If I had my way about it, that race of people would be given their independence; but since this Government does not see fit to follow that policy, there is an obligation resting upon this Congress to see to it that the very best thing possible is at all times done for what I conceive to be an oppressed people, who, if properly treated, have a great future before them.

The people in those far-distant islands are rapidly developing, and as an evidence of their civilization we have this distinguished gentleman on the floor of the House, who represents them, the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands [Mr. GUEVARA]. Then, also, there is our friend Senator Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate, and an abler man does not live in the Orient than Mr. Quezon. These gentlemen are a type of the high-class citizenship who are there, but it seems that the propaganda put over this country through newspapers and magazines and on every boat that carries anybody to the Philippine Islands, has been more or less successful. Even before you are off the Government transport propagandists are there telling you that the people of the Philippine Islands are not capable of self-government.

The United States Congress ought to familiarize itself with the conditions there, and with the people and with the chances that they would have in the future. This committee provided for would be appointed by the honorable Speaker of this House, not from people holding one view but from people of different views. There are some people who think that the people of the Philippine Islands ought never to have their independence; some who think they should not have the chance. We know that they will not have the chance if you are going to cut off their imports into the United States. If we are going to hold the islands, let us do what is just. Our trade relations with that little Republic depends upon a sensible Congress. Instead of talking about stopping their imports from coming into this country, or cutting off the reciprocal relations that exist and putting them on a parity with foreign nations, we ought to be encouraging reciprocal relations. The idea of cutting off their imports seems to me to be utter nonsense. It will not alone affect their commerce but it will be detrimental to the success of the Filipino people as a nation.

They are not a homogeneous people. There are many classes and different strata. They have poor people just like we have in the United States. They have some few rich, cultivated, and cultured people. I never saw anywhere in the United States a more refined and elegant set of ladies than I saw at some of the entertainments I attended in the city of Manila. I have attended entertainments in practically 15 States of this Union, in the most cultivated and refined homes, and I pledge you my word that the swarthy-complexioned ladies who have been cultivated and trained and who attended those entertainments in Manila had all of the earmarks of refinement and culture and I might even say of aristocracy. The people of this country do not understand, because of this propaganda, what the Filipino people stand for and what prospects they have if they are given a chance. Up to this minute since our Government took over these islands they have not been given the chance that they are entitled to, in my humble judgment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am rising now to give my hearty support to the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT] providing for the biennial appointment of a board of visitors to inspect and report on conditions in the Philippine Islands.

I regard the provisions contained in the bill now under consideration as a constructive step to be taken to put the Congress of the United States in a close contact with the people of the Philippine Islands. This should have been done long ago. A frequent visit on the part of the Members of the Congress of the United States to the Philippine Islands will convey to its inhabitants the great interest that this Government takes on their behalf and its desire to know conditions and needs requiring the enactment of necessary legislation.

This visit will have the effect of promoting mutual sympathy and friendliness between the two peoples while living under the shadow of the same flag and protection of the same Government.

The state of isolation which has characterized the relationship between the United States and the Philippine Islands has given rise to some kind of misconception of such relationship on the part of a group of the American people. Why? Because the Philippine Islands, which are 10,000 miles away from Washington and 7,000 miles from the nearest port of the United States, can not be fairly known by the American people unless their Representatives in Congress visit that country as frequently as they can.

The passage of the bill now under consideration will also facilitate a mutual understanding between Americans and Filipinos, whose present problems demand an immediate solution. One of the effects of the state of isolation in which the Philippine Islands has been placed in relation with the United States is the move now on foot on the part of the people of a certain section to curtail the free-trade relations existing between the two countries. The American people as a whole have always considered the Philippine Islands as a foreign country, and they have but a slight idea as to the true nature of the aims and purposes of their Government toward the Philippines.

This movement to curtail the free-trade relation between the United States and the Philippines is causing a tremendous financial loss in the business life of the islands. Native capital is frightened by this movement and is now lying idle in the bank chests. American capital which is needed for the economic development of the Philippine Islands, in accordance with the program of the United States Government, is naturally fearful of making investment in view of the proposed curtailment to our free-trade relations. Uncertainty is now the characteristic of the business life in the islands. It is a miracle that business in the Philippines has not come to a standstill. In a word, Mr. Speaker, there is a tremendous economic crisis in the Philippines in view of the proposed curtailment of the existing free trade. If the board of visitors created by the bill now under consideration had been approved two years ago when it was first introduced by its author, this agitation for free-trade curtailment would not have taken place. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that this unfortunate situation now prevailing in the islands may cause a depression also on the cotton textile trade from the United States. The Philippines are one of the best customers for exports of cotton textile from the United States, as was recently testified before the House Ways and Means Committee. Depression in the Philippines will, of course, reduce the purchasing capacity of the Filipino people for cotton textiles as well as other American products. [Applause.]

Before concluding I wish to congratulate the author of the bill now under consideration, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT], for his constructive plan to place the Congress of the United States in a position to acquire true knowledge and information regarding the Philippine Islands and its people.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Does the gentleman not think that as well as informing Members of Congress of affairs over there the visit of such a committee would be very informing to the Filipino people of the attitude of this Nation, and the general character of the men who are its representatives?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes; I think so.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House, everything that could be said in favor of this bill, everything that I, as the sponsor for and introducer of this measure, might have said, every reason that could be advanced for its passage, has already been said and so well said, probably so much more cogently and better said than I could say it myself, that I would not be justified in consuming much more of the time of the House on this measure. May I express my great gratification at the turn this debate has taken, my enthusiasm, one might say, at the sentiments expressed and the attitude which the gentlemen who have spoken have assumed toward this measure and toward our duty and relation to the Philippine Islands. The character of the debate and the views expressed here justify the enthusiasm, the respect, the regard that I have for this body in which I have the honor to serve.

This is not a new proposition nor a new measure. This bill, substantially in its present form, passed this House unanimously in the last Congress.

The proposed procedure has been recommended by the President of the United States. I violate no confidence in saying that I had, or until the day he left for the Philippine Islands had—I have not had the honor of hearing from him in regard to it since then—the very great approval of the present Governor General of the Philippine Islands, whom you remember made a notable visit to the Philippine Islands some two years ago. No one can go to the Philippines and not realize the enormous responsibility which rests upon our country in regard to the future of this people. As the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] said, the Philippines are a great empire. We should particularly realize the grave responsibility resting upon the Congress of the United States to promote the prosperity and the progress and to develop and safeguard the future of this great island empire. They stretch for a thousand miles in length, are several hundred miles across, and have more than 11,000,000 people. No one who visits them, as I have, can fail to be impressed with the lack of the knowledge of our people of these islands; yes, with the lack of interest that our people have displayed in these brothers of ours for whose fate we have been made responsible. One of the resolutions which I made when I returned from the Philippines after my election but before I took my seat in Congress was to try to establish procedure such as this as a link, you might say, between the Congress of the United States, which is the branch of our Government charged with the fundamental responsibility with regard to these islands and the people and government of the islands themselves.

It is indeed remarkable, Mr. Speaker, in the light of the responsibility we have assumed toward these islands, and in view of all the perplexing questions and situations that have arisen from our relation with them, that no provision has been made in all these years for authoritative and official visits to the islands on the part of the branch of the Government primarily concerned with all fundamental policies and measures. Let us not forget that under the Constitution the responsibiiity rests directly on Congress. In my judgment, that responsibility can not be satisfactorily met, or our duty fully performed, except by periodic visits by authoritative representatives of the Congress itself as here proposed. The great advantage that must ensue, can not fail to more than justify the comparatively trivial expense involved. Also, the advantage of regular and periodic visits must be obvious. Again, advantage will come not only from the informative value of such visits but from the inevitable gratification which the people of the islands themselves will derive from this manifestation of the interest and concern in their welfare by the direct representatives of our own people.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I will.

Mr. JENKINS. It is the fact that the gentleman is the author of this measure, the original measure.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I am glad to assume full responsibility for it.

Mr. JENKINS. One question, and I do not think this was brought out heretofore as I am able to gather. Does not the gentleman think that the establishment of a biennial visit to the Philippine Islands by a committee on a permanent basis will have a tendency to induce the Philippine business men, those who have the problems in the island to face, to gather themselves together and be a medium by which our commission sent over there can take up those problems and thereby sew both countries together, so as to be of great benefit both to this country and the Philippine Islands?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Of course, I do. It will establish a direct medium of communication between our people and their people and their government and our Government, which has never yet existed and can not fail to increase the mutual regard and improve the relations between the two peoples.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I prefer not to do so just now. I have been so glad to hear the distinguished Delegate from the Philippine Islands express himself as he has in favor of this measure. I consider this is a procedure not only for the immediate future but for all time, for so long as we are charged with the responsibility of exercising sovereignty over those islands, and caring for the relations between the Philippines and the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Speaker, I came into the Chamber after most of the discussion on this resolution was over. I have read the report and I have taken the floor to say that I am in favor of it. I remember very well when we commenced to expand after the Spanish War, and we took over Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines; there was a great national campaign in this country in which the question of imperialism on the part of our Government in taking over these islands was the paramount political issue. It was often stated during that campaign that our Government was not suited to governing distant possessions, and there was some force in that argument; it was claimed that Members of Congress will not take an interest, will not take sufficient interest in such insular possessions to enable them to legislate intelligently for them. Now, I have always endeavored since I have been a Member of Congress to induce the Members to visit our distant possessions and become better acquainted with them, to learn something about those peoples and the conditions which exist there in order to enable us to legislate intelligently and govern them properly. But it has been very difficult.

I might mention the Panama Canal Zone. We have a community down there of 50,000 or 60,000 Americans, our own citizens. They have no right to vote. They have no representaive in Congress. And yet they have all the same problems that we have in this country and many more besides; and we have the greatest project down there that any government ever had—the Panama Canal. Congress has to legislate for them, and we are the only ones that can legislate for them. Yet the average Member of Congress does not feel enough interest in the welfare of our people down there to go there and study their conditions. In order to induce Members of Congress to go to the Panama Canal Zone and study the conditions there in order to enable them to legislate more wisely, the Government furnishes to Members free transportation to and from the Canal Zone any time they wish to go; yet even with that inducement not many Members go down there.

I have taken the floor to emphasize this point, that it is important for the Members of Congress to visit these insular possessions and become acquainted with conditions there, so that we can legislate more wisely for them, and such a trip ought not to be called a "junket" or a "joy ride." That sort of loose remark injures the cause of the people who are dependent upon us for legislation; and the Members of this body and of the Senate ought, when they can, so long as we have jurisdiction of these possessions and so long as we have to govern them from here, to take advantage of every opportunity they have to visit them and study their conditions.

I think this bill now under consideration is a great step in the right direction, and we ought to do this not only with reference to the Philippines, but also with reference to Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands and Hawaii.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And Alaska?

Mr. DENISON. And the Members ought to take some such action to get better acquainted with conditions in Alaska, and, as I have just said, with the people on the Canal Zone. The people on the Panama Canal Zone have to have laws the same as we have here, and there is often need of changes in those laws. And yet there is no one to do it unless Congress does it. As chairman of the subcommittee on the Panama Canal, I go down there as often as I can. I spend my own money in studying conditions down there. Some day soon when I can have opportunity I am going to address the House on the conditions on the Canal Zone. There is every reason why we should take this action now and provide for an official committee to visit the Philippines and get information for the benefit of Congress in considering any legislation that may be needed in carrying out our great responsibilities toward those people.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I have been deeply interested in the discussion this afternoon, because it has been my good fortune to spend some time in the Philippines. I have been greatly interested in the intelligent and splendid people who live over there. I want to speak not only in the interest of the Filipino but of Americans in the Philippines. Not much has been said about the American side of it. That is the reason why I rise on this occasion, to let you know a little of what our own people are doing over there at the present time.

Of course, you gentleman know that for eight years I have been handling appropriations for the Department of Commerce, and during those eight years we have had our attachés and trade commissioners visit the various countries of the world. One of those countries, I am happy to say, is the Philippine Islands. It was natural that I should be interested in the work being done there in connection with international trade, and to ascertain whether it was really a worth-while proposition or not. I was invited one night to a banquet given by one of the great American commercial companies of the United States. I was invited to attend that banquet to meet their traveling men. I suppose that night there were 20 of their representatives from 20 different countries, and I want to say to you that they were speaking not less than 20 different languages. Many of them came there speaking through interpreters.

After I had left the islands and had gone over to China, one day I was riding along in a ricksha and I saw a little mark on the tire of the vehicle which caused me to ask the ricksha driver to hesitate a moment. I found on examination that that tire was made in my city, and I found that that same tire was sent out to the Philippines and distributed from that point along with many other things that they were distributing.

I want to say to the House that we should pass this bill for no other purpose or reason than that Manila is a distributing point of great value to American business. The Philippine Islands are in the Orient along the edge of China; China will offer great possibilities; we find that the Philippine people can manufacture anything and do it more cheaply than we can do it; and the longer I stayed the more I was pleased and delighted with what I found there, and I rejoiced to learn how glad those people were that the Philippine Islands were a part of the United States of America. I found that the Filipinos were proud of the fact; when they came here to the United States they were able to meet on an equality.

I never discussed the question of independence. In fact, I was the guest of Senor Osmenia, the president of the Philippine Senate, for a week, and he did not discuss the question of independence. We talked of other things. I was also a guest of a leader on the other side. I was honored by having a visit with General Aguinaldo for half an hour, and I know how he feels on these questions.

I do not intend to quote him, but I want to say to you that I found nothing from the highest to the lowest but splendid friendship for the people of the United States, and I am heartily in favor of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed for one additional minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows of anything that will interrupt the pleasant relations between the Philippine people and the American people quicker than to put restrictions on their imports to this country?

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman is absolutely right about that. [Applause.] We must leave conditions just as they are. We now have the confidence of the Philippine people and have had that confidence for many years. I do not feel that at this time we should do anything that would cause them to lose that confidence. I will say to the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey that I fully agree with him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. It seems to me that this bill is distinctly worth while, for the many valid reasons which have been cited by others who have taken the floor before me. One point, however, it seems to me, has not been impressed as it might be. Much has been said about the information which the members of the proposed board will bring back from the Philippines, and this, of course, is important. I, for one, believe that Members of Congress should visit the places on this globe where this country has great interests just as often as possible and learn just as much about them as possible. I have no patience with people—newspaper correspondents and others—who continually refer to these trips of Members of Congress as junkets, joy rides, and things of that sort. [Applause.] Such characterization of trips of this character is entirely out of place. It is misleading and very unfair as well as unjust to Members of Congress who honestly and earnestly seek for information concerning matters with which we must deal here in this House.

Mr. THURSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. THURSTON. Is it not true that great corporations require some of their officers to visit their outlying plants?

Mr. TILSON. Of course they do, and the corporations pay for the visits, whereas most of the Members of Congress who visit these places do so at their own expense. Yet they are glad to do it, because they realize the benefits flowing from such visits.

I think that the board to be appointed under this bill will probably render its greatest service not by the amount of information which its members may bring back—because such information, to a certain extent, might be gathered through other sources—but by the benefit to the relations between us and those people that will flow from the appointment of an official board by this country to visit them. Such an official board will have a great effect upon the people there. It will seem to them that this great Government of ours has a particular interest in them sufficient to justify us in appointing an official board to visit them to hear anything they may have to say in the way of grievances, protests, requests, or anything else they may wish to submit. It seems to me that perhaps the very greatest good that will flow from the appointment of such a board will come in this way. I regard it as of very considerable importance that the people of these distant lands, bound to us by the ties now existing, should understand how deeply we are interested in them and their well-being. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last four words. The sentiment of the House is manifestly practically unanimous in favor of this resolution and sufficient argument, I think, has been made to justify it in the public mind and to prevent any sort of public criticism of the Congress from any who are at all thoughtful for passing this resolution and sending some of its Members to the Philippine Islands each year for the purpose of studying questions growing out of our relations with that people.

This is a thing which I have long thought ought to be initiated. Out of 24 years of service in the House, something like 18 years, as I now remember it, were spent by me as a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs. I was appointed to that committee to fill a vacancy that occurred during my first term, and I served on it until a few years ago when I retired from all committees of the House except the Committee on Rules. I had the honor of being chairman of that committee for a brief period. I was associated very closely with those who drafted the present organic law of the Philippine Islands, commonly known as the Jones Act, as well as the Porto Rican act.

Yet in all this time, charged with a responsibility of legislating, conditions were never such as that I was able to visit the Philippine Islands. Notwithstanding I sometimes think I gave more attention to them than anything else in my entire service here, I never felt I had the real grasp of the situation there that gave me as good equipment as I would like to have had, at least, in dealing with legislation affecting that people.

I do not know why this has not been done long ago. It ought to have been done. I know it ought to be done now; at least, I feel so.

Let me say this further word, not exactly upon this resolution but in view of some of the questions that have been asked here this afternoon. I think it was in the first Congress of which I became a Member, the Fifty-ninth, or if not, the Sixtieth, that the free-trade relations were established by law between the United States and the Philippine Islands.

Prior to this time duties had been levied on products coming in from the Philippines and I believe duties levied on products that we exported to the Philippines, the revenues going into the Philippine treasury. President Taft, then Secretary of War, who had been the first Governor General of the Philippines, had such a keen sense of justice upon this subject as that he was perhaps the leading advocate of the establishment of the free-trade relations between the Philippine Islands and the United States. There were many at that time in the party of which Mr. Taft was a member who were very reluctant. Upon the Democratic side there were some who were also reluctant, not so much because of the economic ideas involved as because of a belief that the establishment of free-trade relations between the Philippine Islands and the United States would postpone the day of independence. This was particularly true of some of the strong "independence" people upon my side of the Chamber. But all that was overcome and, as I remember it now, by a pretty unanimous vote—I have forgotten just what the vote was—we established those relations.

I just want to say in passing—I shall not be here to deal with it—that to my mind it is inconceivable that this Government now will turn the hands of the clock back to where they stood 25 years ago. [Applause.] I do not anticipate that anything of that sort is going to happen. [Applause.]

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 1 of the bill in order that I may offer a perfecting amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to return to section 1 for the purpose of offering a perfecting amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. On page 2, line 5, at the end of the line, strike out the period and insert "and shall appoint a clerk and fix the compensation of said clerk."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KIESS: Page 2, line 5, after the word "members," strike out the period and insert "and shall appoint a clerk and fix the compensation of said clerk."

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask my chairman if this provides that the commission or committee shall fix the salary or is that left with the Committee on Accounts, as the rest of the fiscal relations of the bill are left?

Mr. KIESS. The bill provides that the board shall select a chairman from its members and this amendment provides for the selection of a clerk. My attention was called to the fact that section 2 provides for the expenses of the clerk, along with the members, but there is no provision made for the selection of the clerk or the pay of the clerk. This will leave it to the members of the commission.

Mr. UNDERHILL. In the second section, is it not left with the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. KIESS. The expenses are to be paid out of the contingent fund, with the approval of the Committee on Accounts. This does not change that part.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The clerk is a part of the expense.

Mr. KIESS. There is some ambiguity in the second section where it says "actual expenses for travel of such members and a clerk.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is for the traveling expenses of the clerk. Now, you provide further on, in section 2, for the payment of the clerk.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; if the gentleman will pardon me, I took the liberty of calling this ambiguity in the bill to the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS]. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will get the text of the bill and read the second section he will see it carefully provides for the payment of the traveling expenses of the members of the commission and a clerk, but nowhere in the bill, unless the amendment now proposed is adopted, is there any authorization for the employment of a clerk by the commission or the fixing of his compensation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 2 of the bill in order that I may offer a perfecting amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to return to section 2 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. Line 8, page 2, strike out the word "a" and substitute the word "such"; and also in line 13 of the same page, strike out the word "a" and substitute the word "such."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KIESS: Page 2, line 8, after the word "of," strike out "a" and insert in lieu thereof the word "such"; and also in line 13, strike out the word "a" and insert in lieu thereof the word "such."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the debate on this bill be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KIESS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made in the House this afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

THE SAMOAN GROUP OF ISLANDS

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate Joint Resolution 110, on the Union Calendar, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the Senate Joint Resolution 110, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 110) to provide for accepting, ratifying, and confirming the cessions of certain islands of the Samoan group to the United States, and for other purposes

Whereas certain chiefs of the islands of Tutuila and Manua and certain other islands of the Samoan group lying between the thirteenth and fifteenth degrees of latitude south of the Equator and between the one hundredth and sixty-seventh and one hundred and seventy-first degrees of longitude west of Greenwich, herein referred to as the islands of eastern Samoa, having in due form agreed to cede absolutely and without reserve to the United States of America all rights of sovereignty of whatsoever kind in and over these islands of the Samoan group by their acts dated April 10, 1900, and July 16, 1904: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That (a) said cessions are accepted, ratified, and confirmed as of April 10, 1900, and July 16, 1904, respectively.

(b) The existing laws of the United States relative to public lands shall not apply to such lands in the said islands of eastern Samoa; but the Congress of the United States shall enact special laws for their management and disposition: Provided, That all revenue from or proceeds of the same, except as regards such part thereof as may be used or occupied for the civil, military, or naval purposes of the United States or may be assigned for the use of the local government, shall be used solely for the benefit of the inhabitants of the said islands of eastern Samoa for educational and other public purposes.

(c) Until Congress shall provide for the government of such islands, all civil, judicial, and military powers shall be vested in such person or persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct; and the President shall have power to remove said officers and fill the vacancies so occasioned.

(d) The President shall appoint six commissioners, two of whom shall be Members of the Senate, two of whom shall be Members of the House of Representatives, and two of whom shall be chiefs of the said islands of eastern Samoa, who shall, as soon as reasonably practicable, recommend to Congress such legislation concerning the islands of eastern Samoa as they shall deem necessary or proper.

(e) The sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be immediately available, to be expended at the discretion of the President of the United States of America, for the purpose of carrying this joint resolution into effect.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, Senate Joint Resolution 110, which provides for accepting, ratifying, and confirming the cessions of certain islands of the Samoan group to the United States has been given careful consideration, and this resolution has the unanimous indorsement of the committee.

These islands form what is now known as American Samoa. A brief reference to the historical background of these islands is given in the report accompanying this resolution:

Prior to 1898 the Samoan Islands were governed as an independent kingdom. When King Malietoa died, in that year, the Samoans were unable to agree upon the choice of his successor and disorders arose. These became so pronounced that in March, 1899, naval craft of the United States and Great Britain shelled some of the Samoan villages and subsequently, on April 1, 1899, landed a force which participated in hostilities at close range, the Samoans finally yielding.

The following year the United States, Great Britain, and Germany divided the Samoan Islands by treaty, which the Senate ratified on February 13, 1900. The United States thus fell heir to the island of Tutuila and others of the group, which constitute what is now known as American Samoa. On February 19, 1900, an Executive order was signed by the President, reading as follows:

"The islands of Tutuila, of the Samoan group, and all other islands of the group east of longitude 171' west of Greenwich are hereby placed under the control of the Department of the Navy for a naval station. The Secretary of the Navy shall take such steps as are necessary to establish the authority of the United States and to give to the islands the necessary protection."

The Secretary of the Navy issued an order conforming thereto on the same date.

The islands of American Samoa from east to west are Rose Island, Tau, Olosega, Ofu, Aunuu, and Tutuila. The islands of Tau, Olosega, and Ofu are generally known as the Manua group, while the island of Aunuu is embraced in the name of "Tutuila." Rose Island is a coral atoll, uninhabited, and of practically no value. Two hundred and ten miles to the northward of Tutuila lies Swains Island, the United States sovereignty over which was extended by a joint resolution of Congress approved March 4, 1925. It thus became part of American Samoa. Pago Pago (or Pango Pango) Bay nearly cuts the island of Tutuila in twain and furnishes the safest and best harbor in all the South Seas.

On April 17, 1900, the high chiefs of Tutuila, without solicitation, ceded the islands of Tuailtu and Aunuu to the Government of the United States, and by deed signed July 14 and executed July 16, 1904, the islands of the Manua group were ceded to the United States. The preamble of the cession of Tutuila recites that the step is taken "for the promotion of the peace and welfare of the people of said islands, for the establishment of a good and sound government, and for the preservation of the rights and property of the inhabitants of said islands," and goes on to declare that "the chiefs, rulers, and people thereof are desirous of granting unto the said Government of the United States full power and authority to enact proper legislation for and to control the said islands, and are further desirous of removing all disabilities that may be existing in connection therewith and to ratify and confirm the grant of the rule of said islands heretofore granted," etc. It was the understanding that the United States was "to erect the same as a separate district to be annexed to the said Government, to be known and designated as the district of Tutuila."

It was not until July 21, 1902, that official recognition of the cession of Tutuila was made by the President, when Theodore Roosevelt sent a greeting to the chiefs and people expressing the great appreciation of the people of the United States in receiving the islands, and stating that the local rights and privileges would be respected. A watch, a medal, and a diploma were sent to each signer of the deed of cession. Similar recognition was made of the 1904 cession.

Since that time the government of American Samoa has been administered by a naval officer, in whom has been vested supreme executive, legislative, and judicial power.

Although acknowledged by the President, the cessions of 1900 and 1904 have never been acted on by Congress. The enactment of legislation for the islands, which was one of the stated purposes of the cession, has not been accomplished.

The United States in taking over this group of islands was particularly desirous of obtaining the use for naval purposes of the harbor of Pago Pago, on the island of Tutuila, where a naval station has since been established. The Samoans, by the action of their high chiefs, were particularly anxious for the establishment of a good and sound government. They had every reason to believe that when they surrendered the sovereignty of their islands they would become citizens of the United States. At the present time they are not citizens of the United States. The American flag flies over Pago Pago, but the citizens are only citizens of American Samoa.

The inhabitants are of the Polynesian race, a race which has produced magnificent specimens of the human race. They are a peaceful, gentle, kindly race, proud in bearing, still very primitive and backward as compared with the white races. They still live much as did their forefathers.

The present government is unusual and the result only of Executive orders. In many respects the government has been good for the Samoans, inasmuch as it has prevented the alienation of their lands and taken care of their physical well-being. There is, however, a lack of continuity in the administration and certain features of the administration which need correction, particularly with respect to the judiciary.

The joint resolution is intended to provide for the ultimate remedying of this situation. It makes provision for (a) acceptance, ratification, and confirmation of the cessions of these islands of eastern (American) Samoa.

It specifies (b) that Congress shall enact special laws for the management and disposition of public lands in the islands and that the revenues derived therefrom shall be used for the benefit of their inhabitants.

It further stipulates (c) that until Congress shall provide for the government of the islands, civil, judicial, and military powers shall be vested in such persons as the President shall direct.

Finally, the resolution provides for a commission to be appointed by the President, composed of 6 members, 2 of whom shall be Members of the Senate, 2 of the House of Representatives, and 2 of whom shall be chiefs of the islands, to recommend to Congress necessary and proper legislation concerning the islands.

Due to many causes, the islands of western Samoa, now under the mandate of New Zealand, have been disturbed by civil difficulties. Many of these difficulties are due to a lack of understanding of the psychology of the Samoans and to the particular circumstances existing in the islands. There has been some agitation and some uneasiness as to the ultimate decisions of the United States Government, so that it is believed that the passage of this joint resolution will make for a better understanding in this little community. [Applause.]

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. What is the explanation of the fact that while the islands were acquired more than 25 years ago no legislative action, apparently, like this has been taken?

Mr. KIESS. That is rather hard to explain. We had almost a similar condition in the Virgin Islands. It was not until 10 years after we acquired them that we gave them citizenship; that was done at the close of the Sixty-ninth Congress. You will also remember that neither Porto Rico nor the Philippines had an organic act until 1916, 18 years after we took them over. I should say that it has been largely the neglect of Congress.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to say that I think the reason that there has been no action by Congress is that Congress did not have the necessary information.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word in order to get some information. What has been the government of the Samoan Islands during this interval?

Mr. KIESS. They were accepted by the President of the United States and placed under the control of the Navy Department. There is a naval station and a naval officer who governs Samoa.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. What kind of a civil government does he administer?

Mr. KIESS. He is the government.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. How many people are there there?

Mr. KIESS. Nine or ten thousand people.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. And he issues his decrees in the form of a civil code?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. He is the judge and executioner all in one?

Mr. KIESS. Yes; but we have been very fortunate in having good men in that position; otherwise there would have been more complaints. The government of the islands has been well done by the Navy Department. We have not given the islands the recognition that the native chiefs thought they were to receive when they ceded the islands to the United States. The action provided in the resolution will make them feel that they are a part of the United States. As I said, they are not now citizens of the United States but are citizens of American Samoa. While the United States flag flies over them they are not citizens of the United States.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. We have provided a civil administration for the Virgin Islands, the gentleman says?

Mr. KIESS. Yes; we did that two years ago, near the close of the Sixty-ninth Congress.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] called up this resolution I asked him to make an explanation of it because of the fact that the action proposed seems somewhat overdue, it being 25 years since the original action was taken referred to in the resolution. As I understand the situation, these islands are practically on the same footing as the island of Guam, in which we have a government under the direction of the Navy Department. An officer of the Navy is the governor; a chaplain of the Navy, I believe, is the superintendent of public instruction of the island. The Navy doctors are the only doctors on the island, and they give free attention to all the people on the island. There are about 16,000 people on the island of Guam, almost twice as many as there are on the Samoan group covered by this resolution. There has been no complaint, so far as I have heard, from either Samoa or the island of Guam as to the administration of governmental affairs. The administration there by the Navy Department has been beyond all reproach. The people on the island of Guam are eminently satisfied, so far as I was able to ascertain from a personal visit to the island, except that they would like to have the little recognition that they are under our flag and that they belong to some country in the world. I suppose that this is the idea which the gentleman from Pennsylvania wishes to embody in this resolution in connection with the Samoans. They wish by this action to be officially and formally taken under the wing of the United States.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. This resolution calls for further legislation. It provides for the appointment of a commission.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; and the commission will recommend what further laws and regulations are needed there. Meanwhile I suppose that they will continue under the control of the Navy Department, just as is the case with the island of Guam.

Mr. DENISON Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. We took over the Panama Canal Zone in 1904.

The fundamental act for the Canal Zone was not passed until 1912. In the meantime Executive orders ruled the Canal Zone, and most of the legislation enforced in that interval between 1904 and 1912 was legislation by the President under Executive order. Some question was raised as to its validity, and in the canal act of 1912 Congress ratified those Executive orders.

Mr. TILSON. I understand that is in effect the situation in these Pacific islands, where Executive orders are tantamount to law.

Mr. JENKINS. And after this commission reports, some sort of an organic law would be adopted?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. It probably will be done after somebody who knows the situation makes recommendation of what the law should be.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. The first section provides:

That said cessions are accepted, ratified, and confirmed as of April 10, 1900, and July 16, 1904, respectively.

This is what lawyers would call a nunc pro tunc order. Will any consequences flow from now dating back to the ratification of the cession of these islands? Are there any obligations that will arise by virtue of dating back this order, instead of having it take effect now? We provide here that we shall be considered as having taken legal possession of those islands as of those dates after 25 years have gone by. Did the committee give any consideration to what legal or other consequences flow from that side?

Mr. KIESS. That question was raised, and we were advised that there were no reasons why this resolution, if passed, would affect any action that has taken place in these years.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting a little more light on the question. This is a rather unique legislative and historical situation with which we are confronted. It is apparent here that we are entering by ratification of these old treaties upon some expenditure, and it probably may amount to considerable expenditure out of the Treasury before we get through with the business. Was there any information before the committee as to whether or not these little specks on the horizon out there in the south Pacific had any mineral or agricultural or economic value to the Government of the United States? I do not know whether they are worth $25,000, and that is the initial appropriation we are making. It seems to me that the information presented here by the committee is very vague and indefinite as to the real value of this proposal to our Government in the future. We have enough troubles out there, it seems to me, now in the Philippines and in the other places where our flag is flying without assuming additional burdens for some inconsequential stretch of territory which we do not know anything about, and that may never be of any economic or strategic value to the Government or the people of the United States. Can the gentleman give us any information whatever on that phase of the matter?

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, in answer to my colleague I will say, of course, that in the consideration of this measure we did not take the view that we were now planning to buy the islands. We have them, and we are told by the Navy Department that the harbor there is one of the best harbors in that section of the Pacific, and naturally we are not going to part with it. As to the natural resources and the real economic value of the islands, I think that the Delegate from Hawaii, who has told me that he would ask for recognition in a few minutes, is in better position to tell us about those facts than anyone on the floor, because the Hawaiian Islands are so much nearer to the Samoan group than we are here in Washington. But we are of the opinion that insomuch as we have accepted these islands by cession we can not turn them adrift. We have done much for them and there is no question but that their condition is much better than are the conditions in what were German and British Samoa, both of which groups are now under the mandate of New Zealand.

There is much more discontent and trouble in those islands than in American Samoa. The Samoans are a proud, sensitive people, and they feel that they have not been properly treated, in view of the fact that they have been brought under our flag, but have never been made United States citizens or given a civil government.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is entirely responsive to my inquiry, as the gentleman said we are not going to buy the islands, but notice we propose to buy $25,000 worth of legislative advice. I notice some commissioners are to be appointed. I must confess I am more concerned with regard to the expenditure over there than in reference to the sentimental side of the proposition. I do not see the necessity of authorizing an amount that large just to get some legislative recommendations about what we shall do with those islands through acts of Congress. It seems to me a rather exorbitant authorization. Does the gentleman propose that those commissioners shall go over there to confer with the chiefs of these islands, designated as joint commissioners, or propose they meet half way, or that those chiefs shall come to the city of Washington to negotiate with the representatives of the Congress? What is the program with regard to the expenditure of that $25,000?

Mr. KIESS. This is a Senate bill, introduced by Senator BINGHAM, who for many years lived in Hawaii. He is naturally interested in the subject, and the resolution was introduced in the Senate and passed and came to our committee. Exhaustive hearings were had, and I will be glad to send to my colleague a copy of these hearings, which will give him more information than I can in the short time at my disposal. However, this report of the Senate bill has the unanimous indorsement of our committee. I believe that when the Delegate from Hawaii speaks he will be able to give additional information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman understands I am not opposing the bill. I was merely endeavoring in good faith to get information.

Mr. KIESS. I do understand.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, about 2,300 miles to the southward of Hawaii there lies a small group of islands which has been under the control of the United States flag for some twenty-eight-odd years. They only cover a territory of about fifty-seven and a fraction square miles and have only about nine thousand and odd people. It was first discovered in 1722 by a Dutch exploring expedition. We first cast our eyes in that direction in 1878 when there was negotiated a treaty by Mamea for the Samoan Government and the American Government which was ratified by the Senate. That treaty gave to the United States the use of the harbor of Pago Pago. That harbor is the best harbor in that part of the South Seas. It is a hurricane-proof harbor and those of you who are familiar with the history back in 1888 will recall the occasion when three of our men-of-war were wrecked at Apia, Samoa, during the troubles that occurred at that time. There were then lying in the roadstead of Apia 3 German, 3 American, and 1 British ship, and the only ship saved was the British ship, the Calliope, which was of a newer character than any of the rest of them. Ours were all wooden frigates. Now along about 1898 the King of Samoa, Malietoa, died and there were fresh troubles as the result of his succession.

We sent another force down there. The Germans sent a force down there, and the British also, resulting eventually in a convention in which the British and the Germans recognized our rights and claims over a certain part of the Samoan group, namely, the island of Tutuila and the Manua group. The British and the Germans arranged a separate negotiation between themselves and the British surrendered to the Germans their right to the part that had been allocated to them, so that the Germans succeeded to the rights and claims, whatever they may have been, to the islands of Savali and Upolu. Upolu is where Robert Louis Stevenson lived for many years and where he died.

That convention, which was ratified here in Washington February 16, 1900, did not cover any rights or titles over the islands, because they were still governed by the native chiefs and kings. But we did want to occupy the harbor, which occupation we had been given the right to by the treaty negotiated in 1978. So, following upon these events, subsequent to the death of Malietoa, during which we lost two officers and two men and the British one officer and two men, the President, by Executive order on February 19, 1900, directed the Navy Department to take over the government and control of the two islands set apart to us in this tripartite convention, and the Secretary of the Navy on his part thereafter issued the necessary instructions setting up those islands as a naval station and directing the commandant of that naval station to take care of their government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Hawaii has expired.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Hawaii asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. The government, by Executive order, having been established, the chiefs of Tutuila and Manua, by two different instruments, made a voluntary cession of their islands to the United States Government, and that in fact was the passing of title to ourselves. In that way, I will remind you, the government of the Republic of Hawaii was passed on to the Government of the United States, only in the case of Hawaii there was a joint resolution passed here ratifying and accepting the cession that had been made by the Republic of Hawaii. This resolution is in effect the same thing, and we are pursuing the same course as was pursued at the time of the annexation of Hawaii. In both instances it was the act of the people of those Territories. In this case it is the act of the people of Samoa, and they have asked, and rightly ask, this, "What has become of this cession we have made to the United States Government?" They are quoted as having said in 1902 that the chiefs and people of Tutuila no longer want to be ashamed that the cession that they have made has had no notice paid to it.

The Secretary of the Navy at that time made a recommendation that the cession be accepted, but no action was taken except that, following upon that recommendation, President Roosevelt sent a communication to the chiefs and people of American Samoa, expressing the appreciation of the people of the United States at receiving the island.

That was in effect one way perhaps of taking over territory, but it is not the way in which the Government usually does such things, and it was not the action of the legislative branch of our Government. They would like to receive a ratification of this cession. They came over of their own free will. They do not complain of the government, but they would like to have the government set up by legislative action rather than by Executive action, which is the case at the present time.

I think that, in brief, explains the question, but I shall be glad to answer questions.

Mr. DENISON. On which one of these islands is our naval station?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. On Tutuila.

Mr. DENISON. Are there any large towns in that island?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. The people are mainly in villages. The total population amounts to only 9,000.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman means on the two islands?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. On the groups of islands.

Mr. DENISON. How many islands do we get by reason of this cession?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. We get, I think it is, six islands, small and large.

Mr. DENISON. Are there any Americans there besides the naval officers who have control.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Only those who are engaged in the missions. There are several missions there—one of the London Missionary Society, one of the Methodist Church, one of the Mormon Church, and one of the Catholic Church.

Mr. DENISON. The people of these islands belong to the Maori race, do they not?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Yes; they are Polynesians—pure Polynesians, of the race to which the Hawaiians belong, the Marquesans, the Tongans, and the Tahitians.

Mr. DENISON. How far are these islands from those on which Apia is located and which now belong to New Zealand?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Eighty miles. The island of Upolu is within sight of Tutuila. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Hawaii has again expired.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 3, line 4, after the word "hereby," I move to insert the words "authorized to be."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KIESS: Page 3, line 4, after the word "hereby," insert the words "authorized to be."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that he include in his amendment the striking out of the words "and to be immediately available."

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I accept the amendment to strike out the words "and to be immediately available."

The SPEAKER. Is that offered as a part of the original amendment?

Mr. KIESS. It is.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be modified.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KIESS: Page 3, line 4, after the word "hereby," insert the words "authorized to be"; and in line 5, after the word "appropriated," strike out the words "and to be immediately available."

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. As I understood the gentleman's statement a while ago, the greatest benefit that will come to the United States is this harbor. That is practically so, is it not?

Mr. KIESS. That is true.

Mr. ABERNETHY. And that is desirable as a base; is that correct?

Mr. KIESS. That is the reason the islands were taken over, as I understand.

Mr. ABERNETHY. And we have had control of them for a number of years?

Mr. KIESS. Since 1900.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF IDAHO, TWENTIETH SESSION, IN THE SENATE.

Senate Joint Memorial 2 (by agricultural committee)

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent: That—

Whereas Idaho is principally an agricultural State and many of her products come in direct competition with those imported from foreign countries; and

Whereas on account of the low tariff, some of our products are being sold at pre-war prices; and

Whereas the present tariff rates do not give sufficient protection to allow our products to successfully compete with the cheap labor of foreign countries: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Idaho (the House of Representatives concurring), That we most respectfully urge the Congress of the United States of America to give careful consideration to the report submitted by the Idaho State tariff committee, and now on file with the House Committee on Ways and Means, in the Congress of the United States, to the end that the proposed schedules therein shall be adopted, all of which we fully indorse and heartily recommend; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Idaho is hereby instructed to forward this memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, and that copies hereof be sent to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I present a petition numerously signed by citizens of Massachusetts residing in Salem, Peabody, and Danver, and employed as leather workers in industries located in their respective communities, praying for a fair tariff on imports of finished leather. I ask that the body of the petition may be printed in the RECORD and that the petition itself be referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures of the petitioners, as follows:

FEBRUARY 5, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH:

The leather industry in our community and from what figures we have throughout the country is in a very precarious condition at the present time. We can not help but blame this on the leather imports coming into the United States. We realize that the tanners can not compete with the foreign manufacturers in the cost of making leather, where the wages are much lower than in the United States.

The figures from the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics show that there were about 7,700 less people employed in the American tanneries in the first six months of 1928 than there were four years ago when the imports began to increase.

The lines which seem to be the hardest hit are the calf and kip, and these are the two in which we are vitally interested. In fact, the figures show that more than one-third of the calf leather used in the United States was imported.

During the three months ending September 30, 1928, the imports of leather were actually greater than the exports for the first time in history.

We believe that a fair tariff on imports of finished leather would greatly benefit the American leather worker and leather manufacturer. We believe that this is the only solution to an adjustment of the conditions that prevail at the present time.

We respectfully request that this petition be laid before the Ways and Means Committee or other appropriate committee of the Congress.

LEATHER WORKERS OF ESSEX COUNTY,
STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS.
(Employed by A. C. Lawrence Leather Co. and National Calfskin Co.)

HOUSE BILLS PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

The following bills were each read twice by their titles:

H. R. 16877. An act providing for the biennial appointment of a board of visitors to inspect and report upon the government and conditions in the Philippine Islands; and

H. R. 16881. An act to approve, ratify, and confirm an act of the Philippine Legislature entitled "An act amending the corporation law, Act No. 1459, as amended, and for other purposes," enacted November 8, 1928, approved by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands December 3, 1928.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate committee having reported similar bills, these bills will be placed on the calendar. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

SALE OF COTTON AND GRAIN IN FUTURE MARKETS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after 3 o'clock to-day no Senator may speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill now before the Senate or upon any amendment pending thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I shall be compelled for the moment to withhold my consent. There are certain matters which I desire to present to the Senate to-day, and if there is placed upon debate such an early limitation I am afraid I shall not be able to do so.

Mr. CARAWAY. If I make it 4 o'clock, will that meet the Senator's objection?

Mr. BRUCE. That depends on whether I would have an opportunity to submit what I wish to say.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to say, if the Senator will pardon me, that there are but a few days left of this session and there are many things yet to be done. I do not feel that there is much more to be said upon the bill. If so, it will mean merely general discussion upon matters which are entirely academic. I had hoped we might reach an agreement so we would get a vote sometime to-day. We ought to vote on the bill. If it is to be passed, it ought to pass, and if it is to be defeated, it ought to be defeated, so the program may go forward.

I think the Senate has been very patient, and I am very much obliged to Senators for their courtesy and kindness in the consideration of the measure. I do want to get some disposition of the bill. If the Senator from Maryland will pardon me, if he will consent that we may fix 4 o'clock as the time for beginning the limitation of 10 minutes for debate on the bill and any amendments that might be presented, I think we could get a vote sometime this evening.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that he renew his request after the Senator from Maryland has taken the floor and concluded his speech.

Mr. CARAWAY. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Maryland now, and then he will have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand the order with reference to the limitation of debate to provide 20 minutes for each Senator after 4 o'clock. Is that the Senator's proposition?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; it is proposed to place a limit of 10 minutes upon debate after 4 o'clock so that we shall get through sometime this evening—10 minutes for each Senator on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. Or any amendment that might be offered. It does not apply merely to pending amendments.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; the Senator is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The unanimous-consent agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that beginning at 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of February 14, 1929, no Senator may speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets, or any amendment that may be pending thereto.

THE ROMAN CONCORDAT

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Birmingham News of February 7, 1929, entitled "A Reactionary Step: the 'Concordat' at Rome."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Birmingham News, February 7, 1929]

A REACTIONARY STEP: THE "CONCORDAT" AT ROME

It is difficult if not impossible for Americans, mindful of their treasured political and religious ideals, to felicitate either the Italian Government or the papacy upon the adoption of the "concordat," signed at Rome on Monday by representatives of the Quirinal and the Vatican.

What has come to pass after months of negotiations between the high contracting parties definitely realigns, if it does not actually unite, church with state in the Kingdom of Italy.

This concordat revives the reputedly outworn formula that that government is best wherein the state props, and is propped by, the church. By reason of this fact, the work conceived by Mazzini and achieved by Cavour in Italy is in part undone. Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi are retired from the Italian scene. Pius IX reemerges, none too cleverly disguised as Pius XI. Temptation is strong to add that the wraith of the holy alliance, the sworn foe of democracy throughout Europe and the world, apparently comes out of its tomb.

Where Metternich, the Austrian fox, failed, Mussolini, the Italian lion, succeeds. Where Pius IX was beaten, his latest successor to the papal throne wins. And, paradoxical though it may seem to be, the latest successor of Gustavus Adolphus, the stay of Protestantism, to the Swedish throne is the first of earth's rulers to felicitate the Pope upon the Vatican's triumph!

It is true that in their sovereign capacities the Quirinal and the papacy have the naked right to conclude any agreement that may please them. It is true that other states, including the United States of America, may not properly interpose any objection of their own. But free and full expression of public opinion respecting the wisdom of this concordat can not be, and should not be, repressed—particularly in a country like the United States, where government is based upon the theory that state and church should function not only separately but even independently.

"A free church in a free state"—this is the ideal that has been set up and maintained in these United States by Protestant, Catholic, and Jew alike. Irrespective of religious faith, this is the polity to which all Americans, capable of appreciating their country's laws and resolved to defend institutions built up under those laws, unreservedly subscribe.

Of all elements of this country's population, there is perhaps none that regrets more keenly the negotiation of this concordat between the Vatican and the Quirinal than do thinking Catholic laymen, if not Catholic ecclesiastics, here.

* * * * * * *

A momentous step—a distinctly reactionary one—has been taken by the papacy as well as by the Italian Government. It is incredible that this intelligence from Rome can find sympathy or support even in enlightened Catholic circles of this country, or of this hemisphere. Undeniably, non-Catholics will not fail to reflect upon what has come to pass with a very lively sense of apprehensiveness.

THE DECENNIAL CENSUS

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate, in connection with the larger phase of the subject, two newspaper dispatches which communicate to the world the attitude which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] has taken with reference to the next decennial census. I read, first of all, an Associated Press dispatch, as follows:

Sharp protest against the reappointment for the 1930 census taking of the "Democratic political appointees employed" on the 1920 census was voiced to-day by Senator REED, Republican, Pennsylvania, in a letter to Director Steuart of the Census Bureau.

Senator REED declared that, despite protestations from Mr. Steuart that he was not pursuing such a course, he had found recent evidence in Pennsylvania of the bureau offering employment again to those who participated in the 1920 census.

"I will not consent under any circumstances," REED wrote to Steuart in a letter made public to-day, "to the arbitrary reappointment by the Census Bureau of Democratic political appointees employed in connection with the 1920 census, nor do I think this will be countenanced by the President elect or by my colleagues in Congress."

Sending to Mr. Steuart a copy of a letter received by a Pennsylvanian signed by the director and offering reappointment for the 1930 census taking, the Senator called upon Steuart to—

"First. Explain why such a letter was sent out (assuming it to be authentic) when it was well known that the census enumerators employed 10 years ago were chosen on a political basis, and in most instances were Democrats.

Mr. President, I really must ask for order in the Chamber. I can understand why it may not be very palatable to my Republican friends to listen to what I am reading, but I think that I am entitled to have a certain degree of quiet in the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators will be in order.

Mr. BRUCE. I continue reading:

Second. Explain the discrepancy between your statement to me and the implications of your letter to this former enumerator.

Third. State now what you have in mind as to the method of assembling the organization for taking the 1930 census.

REED said if the appointments were to be made on a political basis, he expected that he and his colleagues would be consulted. If the appointments are not made on that basis, he said he would insist that all civic organizations interested in an efficient census taking be consulted.

And I read this other dispatch as it appeared in the Baltimore Sun this morning:

WASHINGTON, February 13.—Republicans at the Capitol alarmed over prospects for the reappointment of the 1920 census takers for the compilation of the 1930 census, Senator REED (Republican), Pennsylvania, one of those most active against the reemployment of the 1920 census organization, which, he says, was filled with Democrats, announced to-night he had received assurances from Secretary of Commerce Whiting that no appointments will be made which are not satisfactory to the "responsible political leaders."

"I shall oppose any plan," REED announced, "for the reemployment of the Democratic politicians who assisted in the notoriously inefficient census of 1920, or the employment of individuals whom they may recommend."

Mr. President, I must say that assuming the verity of those dispatches they fill me with nothing less than painful astonishment. I have been cherishing the impression that the Senator from Pennsylvania was a statesman, and now, unless he denies the truthfulness of those dispatches, I am compelled to harbor the idea that he may, after all, be nothing but an ordinary political spoilsman, with conceptions of the public service totally at war with the more enlightened ideas that prevail among the American people with reference to its just demands.

I can speak upon this subject without the least reserve or without the slightest opportunity being afforded to anyone to impute to me any partisan motives, because practically since my boyhood I have been a consistent and uncompromising advocate of the merit system of appointment. I have done everything in my power to see that it was applied not only to the Federal civil service but to the civil service of the States and their municipalities. As far back as the eighties of the last century my attention was called in a newspaper to the fact that a partisan Congressman of that time, Jay Hubbell, into whose class I would, indeed, regret to see the Senator from Pennsylvania drift, had issued an order imposing political assessments even upon the charwomen about the National Capitol. So filled was my soul with indignation—though I never had before given any deliberate thought to the proper principles upon which the civil service of the Federal Government should be based—that from that time on I have never failed to do what I could to promote such principles.

Mr. President, every Senator knows that I am a Democrat, and I can not conceive of myself as being anything else. If there is any man in the United States who believes more firmly than do I in the principles of the old Jeffersonian creed, I know not who he is; nor if there is any man in the United States who believes more firmly than do I in the principles of international policy which were added to that creed by the political ideas of Woodrow Wilson, do I know who he is; but I have always felt that a rigid line of separation should be preserved between the officers of the Federal Government who are concerned with the execution of party policies and the principles that should govern appointments to subordinate offices under the Federal, State, and municipal governments, which have nothing to do with the execution of party policies.

In my own State of Maryland I, and others with far more capacity for furthering the success of any cause than I could claim, both Democrats and Republicans, were engaged for more than a generation in the effort to apply to the State government of Maryland and to the municipal government of Baltimore city the merit system of appointment.

I venture to say that there never was more fervid and disinterested zeal, that there never were more brilliant intellectual powers enlisted in any cause than in that cause in Maryland.

Among its leaders was the late John K. Cowen, the general counsel and afterwards the president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, one of the few men whom I have known in my life who was a truly great man. His powerful mind when fully exerted could handle the hammer of Thor as if it were but a willow wand. Side by side with him stood the late Severn Teackle Wallis, the most brilliant individual with whom I have ever come into contact in the Old World or the New. If anyone should undertake to contrast almost any man that I have ever known in public life in my own or any other party with him I should be ready to say, in the language of Shakespeare:

> So
> With the dove of Paphos might the crow
> Vie feathers white.

Associated with these two great Democrats were also Republican leaders who honored themselves and the community in which they lived by devoting their faculties to the purification of election abuses and to placing the civil administration of the State of Maryland and the city of Baltimore upon the plane upon which it can be placed only by the proper application of the merit system of appointment.

For a long time the contest seemed to be a hopeless one, as all noble contests of lasting significance in their earlier stages appear to be. At times our hearts almost died down in despair with the sense of our impotence ever to attain the exalted goal upon which through so many years we had had our eyes fixed. Finally, when the Democratic Party was in complete control in the State of Maryland under its able and enlightened leader, Albert C. Ritchie, the merit system of appointment was applied to both the State civil service and the municipal service of Baltimore. So now the people of Maryland at least are in the happy position of seeing that system of appointment control not only the subordinate Federal positions in their midst, but all the thousands of subordinate positions within the gift of the State of Maryland and the city of Baltimore as well.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator commenced his remarks, but I understand that he began them by some compliments to myself, calling me among other things a "political despoiler."

Mr. BRUCE. I did not call the Senator a spoilsman. I said that I hoped that I should never have any occasion to call him one. If there is any satisfaction in that distinction the Senator from Pennsylvania is welcome to it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I sincerely hope that there will be no occasion for the Senator to call me that. However, I wanted to ask the Senator if he was referring to some correspondence that has passed between the Director of the Census and myself.

Mr. BRUCE. I was; and I read two dispatches, which I take it for granted were correct. They go to show that the Senator was intolerant even of the idea that some individual Democrats who were connected with the last census, the one taken in 1920, should have anything to do with the taking of the 1930 census. Indeed, if the dispatches are true, the Senator seems to have pounced on certain Democrats of that description up in Pennsylvania, almost with the ferocity with which a ferret might pounce upon a rat.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator understand that in the census of 1920 the enumerators were appointed under the civil service?

Mr. BRUCE. They were in 1910, and that is enough for me; and that census has been pronounced by the Census Bureau the most honest and accurate census that has been taken within the last 40 years.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Very good; but the Senator surely can not understand that they were so appointed in 1920; and if he does so understand I wonder why he objects to my protesting against the continuance of those men in the office without giving a chance to efficient men to apply for the places now.

Mr. BRUCE. What right has the Senator to say that the Democrats to whose appointment he objected were not efficient? It is fair to assume that the Director of the Census wished to appoint them largely because they had proven by the character of their service in connection with the census of 1920 to be faithful and valuable servants of the Government.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It depends upon how much we indulge in presumptions. If we presume that every Democrat is appointed because he is efficient and presume that every Republican is appointed for political reasons, of course we will reach that conclusion.

Mr. BRUCE. I assume nothing of the sort. The Senator has yet to learn the A B C of correct civil administration. My point is that these census employees should be selected in a nonpartisan way, without reference to whether they are Democrats or Republicans.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator applies that point so as to compel the continuance of the Democrats in office and not give any Republicans a chance.

Mr. BRUCE. I do nothing of the sort. I have offered an amendment to the census bill relating to the decennial census of 1930, now on our calendar, providing that all census supervisors, supervisor-clerks, special agents, interpreters, and enumerators shall, without reference to whether they are Democrats or Republicans, be selected under the civil-service rules and regulations.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then the Senator surely will join with me in protesting against the continuance of these Democrats without giving the civil service a chance.

Mr. BRUCE. I will do so when the Senator from Pennsylvania pledges himself to support my amendment, and not before.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I will make my pledges in my own time.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator will never make them.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Now, will the Senator also tell me whether he approves of the action of the Director of the Census in telling me in a letter that he had written to these 1920 enumerators only to get information about local conditions, when I later was able to confront him with his own letter offering them the positions? Does the Senator approve of that?

Mr. BRUCE. I have never seen the letter. All I know about it is what is mentioned, and mentioned in a meager way, in the dispatches to which I have referred. I am not interested in the Senator's correspondence. The Senator's idea was to place under the ban any and every man in the State of Pennsylvania, so far as the taking of the next decennial census was concerned, who happened to be a Democrat, and I have no doubt that he was faithfully voicing the feelings of the Vare machine and of every other political machine that exists in the State of Pennsylvania when he took that position. But I did say that I have been in the habit of classifying the Senator from Pennsylvania as a statesman; and I should be sorry, indeed, to find that he had to be classified along with the rest as a mere political spoilsman, incapable of lifting himself up to the proper plane of intelligence as respects the subordinate civil administration of the Federal Government.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If the Senator's regard is as high as that, it occurs to me that he might at least have asked to see the letter itself before he began to denounce me on the strength of a newspaper clipping about it.

Mr. BRUCE. Here are the two dispatches. One is from the Associated Press, a pretty trustworthy agency, my observation has led me to believe. The other is from the Baltimore Sun, a very cautious and conservative journal, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely; always fair to Republicans. I have noted that about the Baltimore Sun.

Mr. BRUCE. The Baltimore Sun is one of the most independent newspapers in the United States. Indeed, it shrinks from the idea of being called a Democratic paper. My observation is that it is always anxious to make a point of its character as an independent journal.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have no doubt that the Baltime Sun is better evidence of what was in my letter than the letter itself; but it occurs to me that the Senator, who is usually so fair and so scrupulous of the feelings of others, might have asked to see the letter before he began to denounce it.

Mr. BRUCE. It is not so much what the letter of Mr. Steuart says but what the Senator said to Mr. Steuart. There can not be any mistake about that, I imagine.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I told Mr. Steuart, in effect, that he had written an untruth to me; that he had offered the jobs to these Democrats, whereas he told me, in effect, that he had not, and I protested against that. Does the Senator disapprove that?

Mr. BRUCE. What the Senator is reported as saying is—it is all in quotation marks:

> I will not consent under any circumstances to the arbitrary reappointment by the Census Bureau of Democratic political appointees employed in connection with the 1920 census, nor do I think this will be countenanced by the President elect or my colleagues in Congress.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Precisely; and I believe that.

Mr. BRUCE. Then if the Senator is ready to commit himself to that, it does not seem to me that the colloquy that is now pending between him and me can possibly have any fruitful results.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am anxious to find out what the Senator's position is. Does the Senator mean that he does approve of the arbitrary reappointment by the Census Bureau of Democratic political appointees employed in connection with the 1920 census?

Mr. BRUCE. As far as I can see, the "arbitrary reappointment" consists entirely in the fact that the individuals happened to be Democrats; that is all.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will not the Senator give a direct answer to my question? Does the Senator approve of the arbitrary reappointment of those people?

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator will have to produce some evidence to me going to show that there is anything arbitrary about their reappointment. The men were connected with the taking of the last census; and I have every reason to believe that they were going to be reappointed by Mr. Steuart, the Director of the Census, because when they were connected with the taking of the 1920 census they had proved themselves to be efficient and faithful public servants.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator's answer is not as responsive as his answers usually are. He denounces me for disapproving of this arbitrary reappointment. Now he is unwilling to say that he approves it.

Mr. BRUCE. What was there arbitrary about it, pray, except that the men were Democrats?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator approve of the arbitrary appointment of these Democrats who were in the census of 1920 without giving anybody, either Republican or Democrat, a chance to compete for the positions under civil service?

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator knows, as I say, that my wish is to take all the appointees under the coming census out of the field of spoils politics and to place them under the civil-service rules and regulations.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then the Senator admits that they were in the field of spoils politics in 1920, does he not?

Mr. BRUCE. I believe that the census of 1920 was taken under Democratic auspices, perhaps.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is so rumored; yes.

Mr. BRUCE. I think it was. I will say that I think it was taken under Democratic auspices.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; there is a rumor to that effect.

Mr. BRUCE. If it was taken under Democratic auspices exclusively, I am perfectly free to say that I have not the slightest doubt that its workings were attended by a certain amount of political abuses, because not one single census that has ever been taken in the history of this country under partisan conditions has been otherwise than attended by such abuses.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Now the Senator is more candid. He admits that in the taking of the 1910 census, which was taken under a Republican administration, the spirit of the civil service was observed and the work was well done; that the taking of the 1920 census was attended by political abuses, and the civil-service system was not observed.

Mr. BRUCE. The appointees connected with that census not having been selected under the Federal merit system of appointment, I have no doubt—though I do not know—that the operations which resulted in that census were attended by a certain amount of maladministration; but I am told—I know not how correctly—that that census, partisan as may have been its origin, will compare, so far as the honesty and the accuracy of its results are concerned, more than favorably with the two censuses taken under Republican auspices in 1890 and 1900.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator says the taking of the census of 1920 was attended with political abuse, and then he denounces me for protesting against a continuance of it.

Mr. BRUCE. Why, because there were a few or even a considerable number of political abuses attendant upon the taking of a census, is that any reason why every individual who had a hand in taking it should be set down as unfit for future census taking?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is a perfectly good reason against the perpetuation of the system that was attended with the abuses.

Mr. BRUCE. I am trying to break up that system; but I must say I have very little hope of receiving any assistance from the Senator from Pennsylvania in my efforts to break it up.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator's hopes will rise if he will ever take the trouble to read my letter.

Mr. BRUCE. I shall be glad to be disabused.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for the request——

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly I will.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask that the correspondence referred to may be put in the RECORD at this point, so that the Senator will not have to resort to the Baltimore Sun.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Why can we not have the correspondence read?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I shall be glad to have it read.

Mr. HARRISON. We want to be let in on this controversy.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not want to encroach too much on the Senator's time.

Mr. BRUCE. I have not the slightest objection to the Senator's encroaching on my time, certainly if he does not make any more substantial points against my case than he has made so far.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield for the purpose of having the letters read?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the letters.

The legislative clerk read the letters, which appear at the end of Mr. BRUCE's speech.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course it is perfectly obvious——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, why may we not have Mr. Steuart's reply to this letter?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, there are several reasons why I can not put the director's letter in reply into the RECORD, but reason number 1 is that he has not sent me any.

Mr. GLASS. That is sufficient.

Mr. BRUCE. It is perfectly obvious, of course, that the letter addressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the Director of the Census was simply a partisan letter, written with a partisan motive, for the purpose of accomplishing a partisan purpose; that is all. I may say, looking at its blustering tone, that it is very much such a letter as Bishop Cannon, or some other high priest of the Anti-Saloon League, might have written to a Member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator mean that he does not approve Bishop Cannon's stand on prohibition?

Mr. BRUCE. Now the Senator is attempting the rôle which of all others I think he is least likely to shine in, the rôle of a wit.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It seems to have hit its mark for once, anyway.

Mr. BRUCE. The only thing that the Senator was objecting to was what he chose in an euphemistic phrase to call "the arbitrary reappointment" of Democrats. There is not a line in the letter to indicate that he was in the slightest degree concerned about the reappointment of any Republican. It was simply the reappointment of wicked, worthless Democrats that he desired to proscribe.

The Senator did not content himself with this letter to Mr. Steuart—I will not call it this bulldozing, bully-ragging letter, for those might be deemed unparliamentary expressions, but only this menacing letter to Mr. Steuart. The next step he took was to go up to see the present Secretary of the Interior, whose administrative life I am happy to say is now hanging in the balance. I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I do so all the more boldly now that the verity of those dispatches in other particulars has been so completely confirmed, to what one of those dispatches said about his interview with the Secretary of the Interior. The Sun dispatch says that the Senator announced that "he had received assurances from Secretary of Commerce Whiting that no appointments will be made which are not satisfactory to the 'responsible political leaders.'"

Translated into my vernacular, that means that no appointments will be made which are not satisfactory to the sordid, squalid political spoilsmen of the Senator's party——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Something like what was done in 1920.

Mr. BRUCE. Who usually concern themselves about all appointments that are within the reach of their clutches.

I continue the reading of the Sun dispatch:

> "I shall oppose any plan," REED announced, "for the reemployment of the Democratic politicians who assisted in the notoriously inefficient census of 1920, or the employment of individuals whom they may recommend."

I am sorry to hear that any Secretary of the Interior, especially the immediate successor of Mr. Hoover, who has always been supposed to have correct ideas about administration, should have given any such assurance. Mr. Secretary Whiting—he ought to be called Mr. Secretary Whitewash——

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. I think he should at least be called the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. BRUCE. What is that, Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. GLENN. The Senator has been referring to him as the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BRUCE. He has emerged from obscurity so recently that the mistake was a perfectly natural one.

Mr. GLENN. The Senator has been referring to him as Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BRUCE. Then I was mistaken; he is the Secretary of Commerce, but he has made such a slight impress upon the Federal Government that I really forgot for the moment whether he was Secretary of the Interior or Secretary of Commerce.

It makes very little difference. I recollect that John Randolph once, when referring to a member of my family in the public life of Virginia, said that he was not referring to a certain William Cabell, but to another Cabell, "A far better man," he added. "But," he continued, with a contemptuous wave of the hand, "posterity will know no better." And that observation might be applied to my slip in relation to the correct official designation of Mr. Whiting.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that I gather from this letter which has been read to us, not that a Democrat was tendered an appointment, but that a former enumerator who happened to be a Democrat was tendered the opportunity to apply. There is no tender of an appointment here that I can see, but he is allowed the privilege of applying.

Mr. BRUCE. But even that was sufficient to excite the jealousy of such an intense partisan as the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, I would like to ask him whether the 1920 census that is spoken of in such terms in the letter of the Senator from Pennsylvania is the one on which it is expected the reapportionment of Congress is to be made?

Mr. BRUCE. As I understand it, the reapportionment of Congress has been due ever since 1910. The reapportionment is expected to be based on the coming census.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. By a variety of means 4,000,000 Democrats were induced to marry into the Republican Party during the last campaign. These Democrats rendered heroic service. They defeated their own ticket and helped to commission the Republican Party to govern the country for four more years.

But we now learn with amazement from the remarks and the correspondence of the able Senator from Pennsylvania that he seeks to divorce these Democrats from Republican bed and board and that he purposes to prevent them from consuming a single crumb that falls from the Republican table in the State of Pennsylvania.

In the absence of a statutory penalty for ingratitude, should not these disappointed Democrats sue the Republican Party for nonsupport?

Mr. BRUCE. I am afraid the apprehensions of the Senator from West Virginia are entirely well founded.

As I was saying a few minutes ago, I am not in the least concerned, in the purpose which brought me to my feet to-day, whether the individuals who will take the next decennial census shall be Republicans or Democrats. I wish to see all such distinctions completely obliterated as respects that census. In other words, I feel about it as that great man, Theodore Roosevelt, and that other great man, William Howard Taft, one of the ablest and most admirable and lovable men in the world to-day, felt about the census of 1910. They both knew that the censuses of 1890 and 1900 were deeply tainted with corruption, dishonesty, and inaccuracy. They were determined therefore that the census of 1910 should be taken under the auspices of the United States Civil Service Commission.

The subordinates who were selected to take the census of 1890 in the city of New York were selected by Republican Congressmen, if I am not incorrectly informed. The latter, of course, simply accepted, to a great extent, at any rate, the names that were passed up to them by the smaller politicians on the lower levels of political activity. What was the result? More than one man who was selected to take that census in New York turned out to have a criminal record. In other words, more than one individual who aided in taking that census in the city of New York enjoyed the privilege of entering private houses, notwithstanding the fact that he had a criminal history.

The census lists in 1890 relating to the city of New York, were deliberately padded to a material extent for the purpose of keeping down Democratic representation in Congress. Thousands of individuals in New York City who should have been placed upon the census lists were not placed upon them because of the dishonesty and incapacity of many of the census takers. Indeed, in some cases it was afterwards ascertained that entire houses in the city of New York had been omitted from the census together with all their inmates. So unsatisfactory, so far as public approval was concerned, was the taking of the census of 1890 in New York City, that the police authorities of the city, acting at the suggestion of its mayor, had another census taken in that city, and that census disclosed the fact that no less than 200,000 residents of the city of New York had been omitted from the Federal census of 1890. It was afterwards computed by the Director of the Census himself—that is to say, after the city census had been taken—that the Federal census of 1890 might have been taken at a cost of some $200,000 less and within a year's less time than it was actually taken.

Now I am not saying that the Federal census of 1890 would not have been just as defective and objectionable if it had been taken under Democratic auspices, because it is my belief that it would have been. A census should not be taken under any partisan auspices whatsoever, Republican or Democratic. Such abuses as characterized the Federal census of 1890 will inevitably creep in just as soon as we give free play to partisan rapacity.

Now the census of 1900——

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Does the Senator feel that better results would have been obtained by having recommendations for the appointment of supervisors and enumerators come from civic organizations rather than having them presented by members of Congress?

Mr. BRUCE. We could not rely upon that plan. Of course, just as soon as the civic organizations were chosen as the selective agencies, the ordinary run of politicians would hurry to the Congressmen and the Congressmen would hurry to the civic organizations and bring to bear all the pressure they possibly could which would be great to secure appointments at their hands, and so we should find that no improvement had been really worked at all.

The advantage about the civil-service system as the agency for the selection of subordinate employees is that it is a wholly impersonal system to begin with. Then it is a wholly nonpartisan system. I am going to use another illustration peculiarly familiar to the Senator from New Jersey and myself. I refer to the selection of prohibition agents. I hope that such illustrations will always be familiar to the Senator. They have been since I have been here, and I hope they will be after I shall have gone. General Andrews testified in 1926 that prohibition field agents had been largely appointed at the instance of the evangelical churches, the Anti-Saloon League, and Wayne B. Wheeler. I have always said that whatever else may be said about the prohibition movement in this country, it is one of the most disinterested movements, certainly in its beginning, that our political history has ever known.

I am not suggesting, therefore, that the churches and the Anti-Saloon League and Wayne B. Wheeler, in passing up names to the Prohibition Commissioner, consciously suggested unconscionable or incompetent men, and yet what was the result? Out of a small force of a few thousand prohibition agents some 875 of them were dismissed either for violations of the Volstead Act or for downright rascality in some form or other.

Mr. EDGE. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BRUCE. Just a moment, if the Senator please.

Mr. EDGE. I merely desired to repeat my question.

Mr. BRUCE. It was because of those results that the prohibition leaders, most wisely from their point of view, insisted that in the future prohibition agents should be selected in accordance with the civil-service statutes and regulations.

I yield now to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator expressed doubt as to the advisability of permitting civic associations to recommend the supervisors and enumerators rather than to have them recommended by Members of Congress. I agree with him absolutely, but I want to invite his attention to a passage in a letter from the Department of Commerce in answer to a letter from me on the subject that has been discussed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. Without reading the entire letter, the administrative assistant of the Department of Commerce makes this statement, referring to the Director of the Census:

> He believes that probably satisfactory results could be obtained by having some responsible local organization of business men of the city selected as the headquarters suggest the name of a leading qualified citizen who would be willing to do the work required of a supervisor or enumerator.

I merely invite attention to this because it demonstrates that the Director of the Census disagrees with the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from New Jersey in apparently starting an innovation in having chambers of commerce recommend enumerators and supervisors rather than having them recommended by Members of Congress, who are expected to recommend judges and prosecutors and district attorneys and practically every other officer in the Federal service.

Mr. BRUCE. That is from the Director of the Census?

Mr. EDGE. It is a letter from the administrative assistant of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. BRUCE. Speaking for the Director of the Census?

Mr. EDGE. I assume so.

Mr. BRUCE. What could the poor bedeviled man do when he was pressed by powerful Senators like the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and others except suggest that some other agency than the Civil Service Commission should be selected to make the appointments?

Now we pass on to the Federal census of 1900, another census that was taken under purely partisan auspices. Of course, that census too was a Republican census, but if it had been taken under Democratic auspices it would not, in my judgment, have been any better. I need not go further than the boundaries of my own State to show what sort of census that proved to be. Down in St. Marys County, Md., in order to pad the census lists in such a manner as to secure a larger representation for one of the two parties in the Maryland House of Delegates, even the graveyards and the summer hotels were canvassed. Individuals who had long been sleeping in the repose of death and individuals who had cooled their brows only for a few days, or weeks at the most, during the heated spell of the summer in that fair and historical county, were placed on the census lists. So brazen was the dishonesty that marked the taking of the 1900 census in Maryland alone that when the Federal grand jury in that State came to review some of the criminal offenses which arose out of its taking they said:

> So long as such appointments are treated as part of the spoils of politics, the recurrence of such frauds and scandals as have been revealed by our investigation may be expected.

And so they may.

I forget what Federal census it was, but I recall the time when an enumeration of the negro population at the South was generally accepted as being utterly inaccurate and inconclusive. Perhaps the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] can refresh my memory as to just which of the Federal censuses this was. It was not until a later census was taken of the negro population at the South that anyone in the United States really knew how rapidly or how slowly the negro population in the South had grown since negro emancipation.

Now, having said what I have with respect to the 1890 and 1900 censuses, both of which were lamentably defective censuses, I repeat that the census of 1920, taken under Democratic auspices, will, to say the least, favorably compare, if not more than favorably compare, in every respect with those Republican censuses.

Let us pass on, however, to a real census, a census which bears the impress of the two great men to whom I have already referred, Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft, a census which has been pronounced by the Census Bureau to have been the most accurate and honest census that has been taken in this country within 40 years. I am referring to the Federal census of 1910.

Congress passed a bill providing that this census should be taken by political spoilsmen in the old way and President Theodore Roosevelt vetoed the measure. There never was in the history of this country a more fearless and more puissant champion of the Federal merit system of appointment than was he. His belief in the beneficient workings of that system was not skin deep. It was a part of the very marrow of his bones. So he vetoed that bill and it was returned to Congress just before President Taft came in. President Taft in turn let Congress know that it would be useless for it to send such a bill to him, because in his judgment, too, the subordinate employees who would take the 1910 census should be selected under the civil service laws and regulations.

So a large body of office census takers, some 7,000 or 8,000, as I recollect, were selected under the auspices of the United States Civil Service Commission, and Mr. Durand, a friend of the Federal merit system of appointment, who was the Director of the Census at that time, with the aid of some 4,000 or 5,000 examining boards of the United States Civil Service Commission throughout the country, selected the field agents for the taking of the 1910 census, that is to say, the supervisors, the supervisors' clerks, the special agents, the interpreters, and the enumerators, in accordance with plans of selection formed by the United States Civil Service Commission. So far as I know not the slightest stigma, not one solitary reproach from that day to this has ever attached to the 1910 census.

Then came along the 1920 census, which afforded the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] the opportunity for writing the letter that he did to Mr. Steuart. House bill 393 provides that the census force that is to be employed in the District of Columbia for the taking of the 1930 census shall be selected subject to the Federal civil service laws. Then it proceeds to exempt from the operation of the civil-service statutes and regulations all the supervisors, supervisors' clerks, special agents, interpreters, and enumerators that are to be employed in connection with the taking of that census. In other words, the object of the bill is not so much to secure an honest, accurate, and trustworthy census of our American population and of many of our economic interests as to create a vast mass of party spoils for the Senator from Pennsylvania and those who share his views about what the civil-service administration of our country should be.

It is computed that under the workings of the bill there will be 375 supervisors, some 9,000 or 10,000 supervisor-clerks, special agents, and interpreters, and from 90,000 to 95,000 enumerators. A wonderful morsel, indeed, will that be for the voracious maw of the old spoils system of patronage. It cost us years and years of effort to snatch—to use the language of the Scriptures—the spoils of some 300,000 or 400,000 subordinate offices under the Federal Government from between the teeth of the political machine. Now we are asked to commit to those hungry teeth more than 100,000 Federal officers. I, for one, will never consent to do it; and I feel that I have a rather better standing than some other Members of this body to withhold my consent because of the fact that throughout my entire manhood my convictions have wedded me to the just, the efficient, and the enlightened system of civil appointment known as the Federal merit system.

How perfectly hollow is the pretense that the proper employees for the 1930 census could not be selected under the auspices of the United States Civil Service Commission! The chief argument against that method of selection is that most of the appointments are temporary. That is no argument at all. When the United States Civil Service Commission comes to make up eligible lists of appointees it is not bound to hold competitive examinations. It can hold competitive examinations or noncompetitive examinations as it believes that the special conditions of each case require. Under the provisions of the civil service laws the President of the United States can exempt from examination any subordinate office that falls within the scope of the Federal classified service; and I am bound to say that I think that the Senator from Pennsylvania, unless he is absolutely certain of his ground, was rash indeed when he suggested that the President elect, Mr. Hoover, would be favorable to the wild scramble for office that would ensue if the plan of selecting census employees that the Senator from Pennsylvania has in mind were adopted. If Mr. Hoover has been distinguished for anything it has been for successfully conducting any office of which he may have been the incumbent along lines of administrative efficiency. Until I know the contrary, to my mind, at least, it is inconceivable that he would not be glad, as Theodore Roosevelt was, as William Howard Taft was, as any man worthy of his presidential salt would be, to see all of these census subordinates selected under the auspices of the United States Civil Service Commission.

There is another thing that must be remembered. Not only is there a vast number of subordinate offices—upward of a hundred thousand, as I have said—to be filled in connection with the taking of the next census, but upon that census is to be based the next apportionment of congressional representation. Whether that apportionment shall be fair or unfair, whether it shall create public satisfaction or public dissatisfaction will depend largely on the conditions under which the census of 1930 shall be taken as respects the appointment of census employees.

As everybody knows, the next apportionment of representation in Congress is being watched with the most jealous circumspection. I do not wish to say any untimely thing when the chair happens to be occupied, as it is at present, by a Member of the Senate for whom I entertain the profoundest respect, but who as we all know is a prohibitionist, but our prohibitionist friends, all of us are aware, are peculiarly interested in seeing that the next apportionment of congressional representation shall be based, so far as possible, upon an accurate and reliable census, because the next apportionment of representation is likely to result in any event in a considerable addition to urban representation at the expense of rural representation, and after all it is in the rural communities that the influence of prohibition mainly resides.

That, I believe, Mr. President, concludes all that I have to say at this time with reference to my amendment to House bill 393. Whether I have spoken feebly or cogently matters little in the long reckoning; but I can honestly say that I have spoken from the depths of an intensity of intellectual and moral conviction touching the matter to which I have been addressing myself such as I almost believe that it would be impossible for me to bring to any other subject whatsoever.

Mr. BRUCE subsequently said: Mr. President, if there is no objection, I would like to have the correspondence which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] injected in the speech which I delivered at an earlier stage of the session to-day inserted at the end of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Which end does the Senator mean? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUCE. I take it the Senator is in doubt because he is so much in the habit of playing both ends against the middle. [Laughter.]

The letters referred to are as follows:

FEBRUARY 12, 1929.

Hon. S. G. PORTER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PORTER: I am sending you herewith copies of a letter addressed to Dr. W. M. Steuart, Director of the Bureau of the Census, under date of February 9.

This letter directs attention to a serious condition in connection with the plans for taking the 1930 census. Whether considered from the viewpoint of an efficient enumeration, without regard for political factors, or in its political factors, or in its political aspects, the apparent plan to reemploy supervisors and enumerators who served 10 years ago is, in my judgment, indefensible.

Under the circumstances, there is no other course open to us but to protest as vigorously as we may, keep the facts before the public, bring them to the attention of our colleagues, and by such representations and actions as may seem appropriate compel those in charge of the census to recognize the public's interest in the enumeration and right to be heard in connection with the plans for taking it.

I may say further that unless Doctor Steuart can satisfactorily explain the letters which have gone to former enumerators, particularly in the light of his own letter to me, I shall bring all the facts to the attention of President-elect Hoover following his inauguration.

I shall greatly appreciate it if, in consultation with the other members of the advisory group of the Pennsylvania delegation, you can arrange to have the copies I am sending you placed in the hands of each Member of the House from Pennsylvania for their reference and such action as they may desire to take either individually or collectively.

Faithfully yours,

D. A. REED.

Mr. BRUCE. For the life of me I can not see any inconsistency whatever between that letter and the dispatches which I have cited, except that the dispatches——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator permit the other letter to be read? All that the clerk has read was the covering letter that went with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator yield for the reading of the other letter?

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, certainly, if there is anything left to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read the letter, as follows:

FEBRUARY 9, 1929.

Hon. W. M. STEUART,
Director Bureau of the Census, Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. STEUART: On January 24 I wrote you saying that reports had reached me to the effect that some one speaking for the Census Bureau had sent out calls for applicants with a view to making up the personnel of supervisors and enumerators for the 1930 census. I stated that these calls, as I understood it, had gone to former supervisors and workers employed in connection with the 1920 census, all or most of whom were political appointees and presumably Democrats. I asked whether or not this report were true, and asked, further, on what basis it was proposed to appoint these enumerators this year.

Under date of January 28 you wrote me, saying you "imagined my constituents had received a letter from the United States Chamber of Commerce, representatives of which had been making inquiries concerning census work and methods." You stated further that in connection with the preliminary work for the coming census "the bureau has been corresponding with persons who acted as enumerators at prior censuses for the purpose of securing information concerning local conditions that would enable us to fix the rates of pay of the enumerators." You stated further that such correspondence had also been carried on with other persons who were familiar with local conditions. The clear import of these statements by you was that it was not the plan to reemploy enumerators who assisted in taking the 1920 census.

After hearing repeatedly from various sources that letters purporting to offer employment to former enumerators were going out from your office, I have now received a copy of a communication addressed under date of January 23 to Peter M. Lowry, 631 Hillside Avenue, Franklin, Pa., and signed by you, which contains the following language:

"Preparations for the field work in connection with the Fifteenth Census are now under way. This work will probably be done during the coming fall or the spring of 1930.

"The records of the bureau show that you were employed as an enumerator at the 1920 census, and it would be of considerable assistance to know whether you would be interested in a similar position in connection with the Fifteenth Census work.

"The census of 1930 will cover population as well as agriculture and other subjects. If you are interested, please make an indorsement to this effect at the bottom of this letter and return it in the inclosed official envelope, which requires no postage. At a later date, a form will be sent you to be used in filing your formal application.

"If you are not personally interested you may be able to furnish the name and address of some other person, and I shall be glad to have you do so on this sheet and return as indicated above."

In view of these circumstances, I should like to have you—

1. Explain why such a letter was sent out (assuming it to be authentic) when it is well known that the census enumerators employed 10 years ago were chosen on a political basis, and in most instances were Democrats.

2. Explain the discrepancy between your statement to me and the implications of your letter to this former enumerator.

3. State now what you have in mind as to the method of assembling the organization for taking the 1930 census.

4. State whether it is your plan—

(a) To have these appointments made on a political basis; or

(b) Draw all appointees through the civil service; or

(c) Conduct an examination of your own for the purpose of obtaining desirable appointees.

As to my own position, I desire to say:

First, that I think the census ought to be taken efficiently.

Second, that I am concerned only incidentally in the method of choosing those who are to take it.

If the appointments are to be made on a political basis, with adequate guaranties that the work shall be done efficiently, I shall expect to be consulted before any appointments are made or any eligible list is prepared in Pennsylvania, and I shall insist that the Republican Members of Congress and the Republican organization in Pennsylvania be consulted in connection with the preparation of eligible list and the selection of those who are to conduct the enumeration.

If the appointments are not to be made on a purely political basis, then I shall insist that all elements interested in having the census taken efficiently, including Members of Congress, responsible business and political leaders, civic groups such as chambers of commerce, civic clubs, Rotary, Kiwanis, and Lion Clubs, and similar organizations be permitted to prepare lists of candidates and, through appropriate agencies respecting their common purpose, critically scrutinize the applicants before appointments are made.

In either case I think there should be some examination of candidates to insure intelligence and integrity in the enumeration.

Finally, I will not consent under any circumstances to the arbitrary reappointment by the Census Bureau of Democratic political appointees employed in connection with the 1920 census, nor do I think this will be countenanced by the President elect or my colleagues in Congress.

An early reply giving me your frank views on these points and explaining the apparent conflict between your statements to me and your letter to former enumerators will be appreciated.

Yours very truly,

D. A. REED.

CALLING OF THE ROLL

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edwards	King	Shortridge

Edge	Keyes	Shipstead	Wheeler

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

JAMES W. BASS

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, a few days ago, when the Senate was considering the calendar, I was absent on account of illness. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of H. R. 8748, Order of Business 1565. This is a measure for the relief of the internal revenue collector at Austin, Tex., in the sum of $2,400, to cover that amount of revenue stamps which were lost in his office. The bill has passed the House. A very searching investigation was made of the matter, and no blame was attached to any of the employees of the office. The stamps were simply lost, and the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended that the measure be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8748) for the relief of James W. Bass, collector of internal revenue, Austin, Tex.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SULLIVAN EXPEDITION

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this year occurs the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Sullivan expedition, which was projected by Gov. George Clinton and General Washington and authorized by Congress. The legislature of my State has passed resolutions asking the Postmaster General to issue some postage stamps commemorative of this campaign. I call attention to the fact that the legislature requests that the States of Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, New Jersey, and Massachusetts, whose officers and troops participated in the expedition, be invited by New York to indorse this request. I am very happy to present the resolutions to the Senate, and ask that they be included in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolutions will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The resolutions are as follows:

IN SENATE, STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, February 11, 1929.

By Mr. Wales

Whereas there occurs this year the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Sullivan expedition, which was projected by Gov. George Clinton and Commander in Chief George Washington and authorized by Congress;

Whereas this successful military enterprise was participated in by officers and troops of New York, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, New Jersey, and Massachusetts;

Whereas the Sullivan expedition weakened the Indian alliance with the English, cut off supplies of food, gave protection to frontier settlements, opened the western part of the State for settlement, and helped to win for the American Republic the rich interior of the continent; and

Whereas the legislature and governor have made an appropriation for suitable exercises and historic monuments to observe the Sullivan sesquicentennial:

Resolved (if the assembly concur)—

1. That the Hon. Harry S. New, Postmaster General of the United States, be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be issued 100,000,000 postage stamps of the denomination of 2 cents each commemorative of the Sullivan campaign of 1779 in New York and Pennsylvania.

2. That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Postmaster General of the United States and to the Senators and Members of Congress from the State of New York, properly authenticated by the clerks, respectively, of the senate and assembly.

3. That the States of Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, New Jersey, and Massachusetts, whose officers and troops participated in the Sullivan expedition, be invited by New York to indorse this request.

By order of the senate.

A. MINER WELLMAN, Clerk.

Concurred in without amendment.
By order of the assembly.

REPORT OF THE ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN (H. DOC. NO. 369)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the requirements of section 6 of the trading with the enemy act, I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the annual report of the Alien Property Custodian on proceedings had under the trading with the enemy act for the year ended December 31, 1928.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 14, 1929.

SUIT INVOLVING LAND IN ANDERSON COUNTY, S. C.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to report back favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary House bill 12809, to permit the United States to be made a party defendant in a certain case; and I submit a report (No. 1744) thereon. This matter is of interest to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE].

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, this is a private claim. The bill does not carry any appropriation. It simply gives the United States Government the right to make itself a party to a foreclosure suit, and we are anxious to get it through. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I am not going to object unless the matter is going to lead to controversy. In that case I must object.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to ask the Senator whether this bill has been reported from the committee

Mr. BLEASE. Yes, sir; there is a unanimous report. The bill does not carry any appropriation. It simply confers upon the Government the right to make itself a party to this foreclosure suit.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina whether there will be any debate on the bill?

Mr. BLEASE. None at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TELEGRAM FROM REPARATIONS COMMITTEE TO VICE PRESIDENT DAWES

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, when the second reparations committee met on February 11 the first work of the committee was to select a chairman; and they selected Mr. Owen D. Young. The second action of the committee was that of sending a telegram to General Dawes, chairman of the first committee. This was not only a gracious but a just thing to do. It was a fine tribute and well deserved.

I ask unanimous consent that the telegram itself, without copying the entire news item, be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times of February 12, 1929]

The second committee of experts at the inception of its first meeting in Paris addresses to General Dawes the homage of its respect and the expression of its hope of accomplishing work as useful as that which was realized under the chairmanship of General Dawes in 1924.

OPERATORS' PERMITS FOR ENLISTED MEN IN THE DISTRICT

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1281) to amend section 7 (a) of the act of March 3, 1925 (43 Stat. 1119), as amended by section 2 of the act of July 3, 1926 (44 Stat. 812), so as to provide operators' permits free of cost to enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard operating Government-owned vehicles in the District of Columbia, which was, on page 2, line 3, after the word "vehicles," to insert "while engaged in official business."

Mr. CAPPER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ASSESSMENT AND COLLECTION OF TAXES IN THE DISTRICT

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4441) to amend the laws relating to assessment and collection of taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which were, on page 5, line 3, after the word "That," to insert "beginning July 1, 1930"; on page 5, line 3, after the word "all," to insert "personal"; and on page 5, line 9, strike out "on July 1" and insert "during March."

Mr. CAPPER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF COTTON AND GRAIN IN FUTURE MARKETS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add, on page 7, after line 15, the following:

The provisions of this act shall not prevent any spinner from selling future contracts against actual purchases or contracts to purchase spot cotton.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on yesterday I discussed that proposition briefly. The amendment simply provides that a spinner who goes into the market and buys actual cotton for spinning purposes may, if he chooses, sell a contract and hedge his purchase of real cotton. I think that is legitimate speculation; there is a bale of cotton behind every bale that is sold on the contract.

The provision I seek to reach by that amendment is one placed in the bill by the Senator from Arkansas, that all persons selling cotton shall declare their purpose to deliver the cotton. The spinner does not expect to deliver the cotton. He is seeking to protect his purchase of spot cotton. He has already bought cotton from the farmer. When he made his purchase the farmer was called on for cotton with which to fill that contract. If the spinner desires to sell a contract for insurance purposes, or hedging purposes, as they call it, I think he ought to be allowed to do that, and I am willing to have that provision go into the bill. In that case the spinner who buys a thousand bales of cotton could sell a future contract for a thousand bales.

If the sale of cotton futures was limited to transactions where every man who originally sold a future contract had to be a cotton farmer, a merchant who buys spot cotton, a banker who advances money to produce cotton, and the spinner who spins cotton, it would go a long way toward stabilizing cotton prices and correcting the evils of present-day speculation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not catch the full meaning of the Senator's amendment. Does it cover a case like this: A cotton manufacturer prepares his samples six months ahead, before delivery of the goods. In the meantime those samples are taken to every business concern producing cotton goods in the United States, or to a wholesaler who will distribute them to the retailers. The manufacturer then knows exactly how much cotton he requires, but the finished goods will not be delivered for six months; in fact, they will not be made for some time. The manufacturer, in order to secure himself, must make some arrangement to see that his cotton will cost no more than he figured in the cost of producing those goods. The same thing applies to wool that applies to cotton.

If the manufacturer did not have the chance of buying cotton futures, we will say, or wool futures, and the cotton should rise in price $5 a bale, or whatever the amount may be, more or less, the manufacturer will lose an amount of money equal to that rise, and in many cases it would absolutely ruin him. In fact, I know that to have been the case. Does the Senator's amendment cover cases like that?

Mr. HEFLIN. It does. It takes care of a situation like that. For instance, suppose a spinner buys his cotton at 20 cents a pound to-day, and 30 days from now the price of cotton should decline 1 cent a pound or $5 a bale, the spinners hedge or sale of a futures contract would protect him against such a loss. If the price goes up $5 a bale the spinner would base the selling price of his cotton goods on the higher price of cotton. The purpose of this amendment is to give the spinner the right to protect a purchase of spot cotton. The cotton farmer, the merchant who handles spot cotton and the banker interested in the cotton financially, can sell a hedge under the Caraway bill.

But there are millions of transactions on the exchanges where no spinner and no one else who owns or handles real cotton is back of the transaction, and that is what we are trying to eliminate. If I had my way about it, and I think the Senator's bill goes a long way toward doing it, I would confine speculation to the number of bales produced each year. If there are 14,000,000 bales made, they can speculate, if they testify that they have cotton that they have produced or cotton purchased in the 14,000,000 bales actually produced. So then the 14,000,000 bales speculated in would be based on the 14,000,000 bales of cotton produced by the farmers of the United States. I hope the Senator from Arkansas can accept my amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have no objection to it, because I think the bill provides exactly what the Senator's amendment provides.

Mr. COPELAND. Why should not the same privilege be extended to the miller in respect of grain?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will say to the Senator that I talked with some of the western Senators yesterday, and they may want to have that done later, but they want time to look into it. As this bill will not go into effect for a year, there will be plenty of time to look into that matter and to amend it in that particular.

Mr. COPELAND. I have in mind the small mill where they produce 200 barrels of flour a day. It is very important to order ahead for October delivery, or for some later delivery, and their practice is to hedge in exactly the same manner that the cotton spinners do.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think they ought to have that right, because they are buyers and users of actual grain.

Mr. COPELAND. They are using actual grain. They are simply buying 1,000 or 10,000 bushels of wheat, whatever the amount may be, for delivery in October, and in order to protect themselves against variation in price they sell the same amount of wheat at the same time.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to call attention to the facts of the matter, because I do not want anybody to be mistaken about the effect of the Senator's amendment. He understands it, but I am afraid some others may not grasp it.

No man can sell a contract unless he has on hand or has the prospect of owning the actual cotton or grain. That would be the effect of the Senator's amendment. It does not open the exchanges to a man who neither has nor expects to have. The Senator's amendment permits the man who has bought cotton to sell a future contract against it.

Mr. HEFLIN. The proposition of the Senator from New York regarding grain is along the same lines.

Mr. CARAWAY. But, if I may be permitted to say so, I judged from what he said that he did not quite grasp the limitation in the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Seantor is mistaken about that. I think the Senator from Arkansas has another matter in mind in reference to the bill in general.

Mr. HEFLIN. Let us see if the Senator did not have this in mind: If a miller buys a thousand bushels of wheat, we will say, he is going to make that into flour, and wants a chance to hedge his purchase and he can, therefore, contract for a thousand bushels of wheat or sell as he likes. That is what the Senator meant, I think.

Mr. COPELAND. Absolutely. As a general matter, I would not consider it; but I thought that if an amendment was to be added to protect the cotton spinner, the same provision should be added to protect the miller.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, let us have the amendment pending. I have no objection to it.

If no one else wants to speak, I desire to say just a few words. I presume everybody has made up his mind as to how he is going to vote, largely as the result of propaganda and lobbying outside of the Chamber. Not since I have been in Congress have as many people importuned Members of the Senate to vote against a measure as have solicited votes against this measure.

Mr. HEFLIN. Let us have order, Mr. President, so that we can hear.

Mr. CARAWAY. More Senators are going to vote against this bill without knowing what the measure is than possibly against any other that has been pending, and that is rather a wild assertion, because we know how they vote. They will all get up and denounce gambling. As the exchanges are now run that is all they do. They are not aids to business, and they have not been.

There was read into the RECORD yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina the announced policy of legislation, and the Senator assured the Senate that the exchanges—I am talking about cotton, particularly—were manipulated, were controlled, were exploited, by people who were gambling in them. That is the announcement of policy.

Every fact necessary to substantiate those things has been offered over and over again. Now it is contended, without anybody saying who or how—Mr. President, I think I will just yield the floor; there is so much conversation in the Chamber. I can not discuss the matter when everybody else is talking.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no further amendment to be offered to the bill as in Committee of the Whole, it will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] to say a few days ago that he expected to offer a substitute. He is not in the Chamber, and in view of the importance of the legislation, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Edwards	King	Shortridge
Bayard	Fess	McMaster	Simmons
Bingham	Fletcher	McNary	Smith
Black	Frazier	Mayfield	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SACKETT in the chair). Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, in my remarks on yesterday I made the statement that most of the manipulations on the market in the fall of the year when wheat was going on the market had the effect of keeping the price down and that the bulk of the wheat was marketed at that time owing to the financial condition of the farmer. To-day before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, in a hearing on another measure, it was brought out from investigations and figures taken from 90 farmers' elevators in the States of Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Minnesota that in the season of 1924–25 68.54 per cent of the grain sold for that season was sold in the month of September. In the next year, in 1925–26, 75.54 per cent of all the grain sold was sold in September. In 1926–27 69.21 per cent of all the grain sold was sold in September. I think that is about the average throughout those wheat States. The bulk of the wheat from the hard spring wheat States is sold in September. In some of the States, like Kansas and Oklahoma, it is sold somewhat earlier than that.

It also develops that the price of wheat on the exchanges in September of the fall of 1924 was $1.36 per bushel, when 68.54 per cent of the wheat for the whole season was sold. During the following winter wheat went to $2.09 per bushel. It would have made a very great deal of difference, of course, in the income of the farmers if they had gotten that higher price instead of a low price for the bulk of their wheat that year.

If the exchange market system of handling our wheat and cotton is a proper system, if it is perfectly legitimate and honorable to speculate in grain and cotton futures, and if it is necessary for the farmer to hedge or for the local buyer to hedge under the system in order to protect himself either in the way of sales or purchases, what is the use of the farmer going to the trouble of raising the wheat or the cotton? Why should he not just speculate in the market and save all his labor and trouble and work in raising and producing the crops during the summer?

A representative of one of the Southern States told me very recently that he owned a large cotton plantation in his State. He said that in the spring after the cotton was planted and started to grow and the weather seemed to be good and the cotton getting a good start, he went to a broker and sold as many bales of cotton as he expected under normal conditions to have that fall. He said that in doing that he generally made a little profit. He said by that method of doing business, by selling his crop early in the spring or along in the middle of the summer at least, he generally got a better price than he would have gotten for it by waiting until the crop was actually made and selling his actual cotton in the fall. I asked what was the use under those conditions of going to the trouble of raising the cotton? I said that all he had to do was to buy and sell futures and make his profits, and thus save himself the trouble of going through the farming operations.

It seems to me that is the whole question. If the gambling principle is right, let the farmers do the gambling and, perhaps, they can make more money in those transactions than they can by raising their products on the farm.

RELIEF OF FARMERS IN SOUTHEASTERN UNITED STATES

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon at a time when I was absent from the Senate on account of illness—and I have been detained from the Senate due to illness a considerable part of this week—the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 182) for the relief of farmers in the storm and flood-stricken areas of southeastern United States. By these amendments it was provided that a limitation should be placed upon the provisions for loans and for advances for the purchase of seed and fertilizer by the farmers within the area referred to, the provisions in the Senate bill being altered most materially in the House.

The House amendments provide that loans for the purchase of fertilizer and seed for cotton farmers shall be limited to not exceeding $8 per acre. It is also provided as to other character of crops that only $3 per acre shall be loaned for fertilizer and for seed.

I am very sorry that on account of sickness I was unable to be present in the Senate during the afternoon of yesterday. In fact, I am scarcely able to be here to-day, and am here against the advice of my physician. Had I been present yesterday when the matter came up I certainly would have asked for a conference on the amendments proposed by the House. Those amendments restrict the loans for fertilizer and for seed to not exceeding $8 per acre for the planting of cotton. Such limitation is entirely too small for that particular character of farming.

Then to say that farmers engaged in vegetable farming or tobacco farming and carrying on operations of that character shall not be allowed a loan of more than $3 per acre for the purchase of seed and fertilizer is absolutely ridiculous and absurd, and carries with it no relief whatever. Three dollars per acre is not sufficient to buy enough seed to plant one-fifth of an acre for the average vegetable crop. It is not sufficient money to buy fertilizer for one-tenth of an acre for the average truck farmer in my State or in any other State that is affected by the bill. Yet that is the restriction which has been placed upon the loans which may be made to them under the amendments which were made by the House and concurred in by the Senate yesterday.

I wish very much there were some way by which we could reconsider that action of the Senate yesterday and that we might ask for a conference with the House on the amendments of the House and have the conferees consider the matter of so amending the joint resolution that it might afford some real relief to the fruit growers and vegetable farmers in the hurricane and flood sections of my State and other States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to express my entire concurrence in the views expressed by the Senator from Florida. The amendments provide for a loan of not more than $8 per acre for fertilizer and seed for land planted in cotton or tobacco. Eight dollars per acre might possibly be sufficient in some regions to buy fertilizer for cotton, but in many regions it would be utterly inadequate. Eight dollars per acre for fertilizer and seed with reference to tobacco is ridiculous. In that part of North Carolina in which the bulk of the tobacco crop is grown the usual amount of fertilizer used to an acre planted to tobacco is one-half a ton and the cost of that would be somewhere between $15 and $20. If it is a vegetable crop such as potatoes, where there is a much higher grade of fertilizer used than is used for tobacco, the $3 per acre allowed by the joint resolution for that character of crop would be ridiculously low. I know of a great many potato farmers who use as much as a ton of fertilizer to the acre. A half a ton is considered a very small amount for fertilizer for vegetables, and a half a ton of that character of fertilizer which is used on vegetable crops would cost $20-odd per acre.

I do not see how this could be of any advantage because if the farmer undertakes to avail himself of the benefits of the measure he has to give security, and the only security, as a rule, which he can offer is the crop itself. If he should mortgage the crop to get $8 per acre for fertilizer for his tobacco crop, then he would not be able to negotiate a loan upon his crop for the additional $8 or $9 or $10 that he would have to have in order to secure an adequate amount of fertilizer for his tobacco. The case would be very much worse where vegetables are involved.

I was not aware of the fact that we had concurred in any such amendments. I understood that there was some difficulty growing out of the obscure definition of the territory to which the relief provided in the bill should apply and that the amendments confined themselves to making certain what particular States would be entitled to the benefits of the legislation. I did not know that any such restrictions as to the amount of money available for loans were in the bill at all. I would like to have the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] advise us about the matter.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Senate is aware of the fact that I introduced a joint resolution in the Senate asking for $15,000,000. I thought after a survey had been made that that amount was the minimum that would be wholly effective in relieving the individual farmers of the terrible condition which confronted them. The joint resolution passed the Senate without any limitation whatever as to the amount that might be used. It went over to the House and there, after all this lapse of time, they not only reduced the amount to $6,000,000, but also specified the amount that would be available.

In conference with the representatives of the States affected and those who had charge of the bill, I was informed that this was the very best that could possibly be done, if anything was to be done, to meet the situation this year. I agree with the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Florida that, in the first place, $6,000,000 is totally inadequate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course it is.

Mr. SMITH. I also agree that the amount specified per acre is only helpful——

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it helpful? That is the question.

Mr. SMITH. If the cotton grower and the tobacco grower are to be restricted to $8, the $8 itself is wholly inadequate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does not the Senator from South Carolina know, as a matter of fact, that in order to give the Government the security that would be exacted under the terms of the bill the average cropper would have to mortgage his crop; and having given a mortgage for $8 when he needs $18, we will say, how would he be able to get the other $10?

Mr. SMITH. If the partial relief afforded by the bill—for it is partial—the $6,000,000 should be used in an effort to furnish the growers of cotton and tobacco the full amount they might need, it would not relieve one-half of those who need relief.

Mr. SIMMONS. But, Mr. President, I wish the Senator from South Carolina would direct his attention to the thought I have suggested.

Mr. SMITH. I am coming to that right now. My idea was that perhaps the Agricultural Department could work out some plan by which the money appropriated might be used to supplement whatever credit the cotton and tobacco planters might otherwise obtain and in that way the $6,000,000 could be distributed as far as possible to relieve the situation. That was the idea I had in mind, and yesterday when the matter came up and the representatives of the various States interested were here I asked them what was the best thing to do under the circumstances. As planting time begins in March, and as the control of the appropriation was placed in the hands of the Agricultural Department, I thought, perhaps, that department might afford some partial relief.

The fact of the business is, Mr. President, that the appropriation of $15,000,000 in the bill as originally framed was itself inadequate. The Senator from North Carolina knows that; every man who is acquainted with conditions in the affected territory knows it; but as it seemed hopeless to get any more because——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from South Carolina will pardon me, I wish to say that I do not think under this bill there will be any applications made to the Government in my State for relief.

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. And I think we shall be passing a bill here that will be futile and ineffective. I also think it is an insult to the southern people when they come to Congress and ask for relief for Congress to say, "We will give you a crumb and nothing but a crumb."

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, so far as I am individually concerned, I am still of the opinion that if judiciously handled by the Agricultural Department the appropriation will afford some relief, though nothing like adequate relief. It will at least enable the farmers to get some cottonseed that they otherwise might not get. It may also enable them to supplement some other method of getting fertilizer. However, the minute the proposed appropriation was reduced from $15,000,000 to $6,000,000 I recognized that it was totally inadequate to meet the situation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say for myself that it is so inadequate, it is such trifling with a serious situation, that I would rather see no legislation at all enacted upon this subject.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will allow me just a minute, I myself feel very much the same as does the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]; but under the circumstances, after conferring with others, I thought that perhaps there might be some relief afforded by the appropriation of $6,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does not the Senator from South Carolina know that in certain parts of the South—I think in his State and also in my State—the bulk of the cotton is actually grown by small croppers?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is probably grown by from 1-horse to 3-horse farmers.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Those people who would naturally apply lost their crops; they were unable to pay their indebtedness; they would have no security to offer except the crops this year. We all know when the Government is to make such loans only upon sufficient security the Agricultural Department and the agents of the Government are very exacting about the security. Does the Senator from South Carolina suppose that if those croppers should give a mortgage to the Government upon their crops for the cost of one-half of the amount of the fertilizer they need they would then be able to furnish security in order to get the other half?

Mr. SMITH. I myself think that would probably be one of the difficulties that would be met with; but I want to say again that when I insisted upon the appropriation of $15,000,000, and the Senate without a dissenting vote agreed to it, I was hoping that that amount at least would be retained, and that, if possible, it might be increased. It was not an appropriation; it was not a gift; it was merely extending the credit of the Government to ameliorate a very disastrous and distressing condition. However, when in the other body, as far as I was able to follow the proceedings, the Representatives from the Southeastern States had exhausted every effort in their power and could get no further than agreement to the measure which was sent here, having only about two more weeks in which to act, I was advised that perhaps that measure was the limit of present possibilities. I believe—as the Senator from Florida and the Senator from North Carolina believe—that the provision made was absolutely inadequate. If no limitation had been put upon the amount appropriated, the $6,000,000 for the States involved was itself wholly inadequate.

However, for the reasons which I have stated, I asked that the amendments of the House be agreed to, in the hope that even the small amount allowed by the other body might in some way aid the situation in the Southeastern States. I repeat, I agree with both the Senator from Florida and the Senator from North Carolina that the relief afforded is going to be very small compared with what is necessary.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the trouble about the amendment, so far as the State of Florida is concerned, is that it gives absolutely no relief except in a most meager and niggardly way in the northern part of the State, where there are a few counties in which the farmers might be able to borrow up to $8 an acre with which to buy tobacco seed and fertilizer or to borrow up to $8 an acre with which to buy cottonseed. I have asked for and want relief for that section; but that was not the section of my State that was most disastrously affected by the hurricane and the flood of 1928. The section that was most disastrously affected is the lower east coast, beginning at West Palm Beach and following in a northeasterly direction out to and beyond Lake Okeechobee and into the interior of the State. That is a vegetable producing section, and that character of farming is engaged in almost exclusively there by those for whom I was seeking relief.

Under the House amendment it is proposed to lend them not exceeding $3 an acre with which to buy fertilizer and seed. Anyone who knows anything whatever about truck farming and vegetable farming knows that $3 an acre is not enough in the case of most of the crops to buy sufficient seed to plant one-fifth of an acre, and it is not enough to buy sufficient fertilizer to fertilize one-tenth of an acre. So the provisions of the House amendment and the restriction placed by it are equivalent to giving absolutely no relief to the great section of Florida which suffered most disastrously from the hurricane and the flood.

I admit that the limitation on fertilizer and seed in the case of cotton and tobacco is also entirely too limited and restricted; but in the planting of cotton there is not so great an amount of fertilizer required per acre and the cost of seed and the cost of fertilizer in the case of cotton do not equal the cost of fertilizer and seed for the planting of vegetable crops. Yet the limitation in the case of cotton is placed at $8 an acre, and in the case of the vegetable crops $3 an acre. Why such discrimination against the vegetable grower. Why deny him any relief whatever?

I did not desire, Mr. President, to have it appear that I was at all agreeable to the amendments which were accepted on yesterday, and I desired to have the RECORD show that I was unavoidably detained from the Senate at the time on account of illness. I wanted it to be understood, so far as I am concerned—and I have taken a very active part in the matter of seeking relief for the sufferers from the hurricane and flood in Florida—that the amendments which came from the House and which were adopted by the Senate afford no relief so far as Florida is concerned. I agree with the Senator from North Carolina, and, so far as Florida is concerned, I wish it distinctly understood that this measure as amended by the House affords no relief whatever to my State.

I started the fight for relief for Florida when the request first came before the Senate in regard to relief for Porto Rico. I called for the measure providing relief for Porto Rico to be read from the desk in order that I might know what provisions it contained. As soon as it was read I then and there took the floor and stated that I wanted the situation cared for in my State, because the people there had suffered similar disasters to those which had been visited upon the people of Porto Rico. I later introduced an amendment providing for relief for Florida, but when the question came up that the other Southeastern States on account of flood conditions felt that they were also entitled to relief, I very generously said, "Well, we will work in harmony for the benefit of all of the Southeastern States," and withdrew my amendment applying specifically to Florida.

Now the resultant of it is, and the tragedy of it is, that after I was the first among the Senators to appeal for relief in the hurricane-stricken and flood-stricken section of the United States, the Senate adopted an amendment on yesterday when I was absent on account of illness, which allows my State practically no relief whatever; and that is what I am complaining about.

If a farmer in the section producing vegetables in Florida were told that Congress had provided that he could get loans to an amount not exceeding $3 an acre for the purchase of seed and fertilizer, he would immediately reply, "That is a bunko game, or else those people up there know nothing about truck farming, and the production of vegetables, and the expense of fertilizer and seed necessary to carry on this industry. We hoped our Representatives up there at least knew better, if nobody else knew better."

Mr. President, if this amendment could be brought back to the Senate, and we could have a conference, that is what I should like to have done, and then we might be able to work out something more satisfactory.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the House amendments to Senate Joint Resolution 182.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator simply wishes to do that without asking for the consideration of the motion now?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I wish to enter that motion now. Further, I want to move——

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator will not move to do it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply want to move that the House be requested to return to the Senate the message announcing the concurrence of the Senate in these amendments.

Mr. CARAWAY. Would the Senator mind asking unanimous consent to do that? I do not want to have the pending business displaced.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it would displace the regular order, I will do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is a privileged motion. It will not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. CARAWAY. All right.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent to enter this motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the motion will be entered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now move that the House be requested to return to the Senate the message announcing the agreement of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to request the return of the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have nothing further to say, except that I do not wish it to be understood that I mean to criticize the Senator from South Carolina for agreeing to these amendments. I unfortunately was absent on account of illness yesterday, and I had not seen the amendments which were brought in from the House. In some discussion with regard to the matter several days ago I had understood that the House amendments placed a restriction only upon cotton and tobacco. Of course, if it placed a restriction upon cotton and tobacco, and that was acceptable to the representatives from the States producing these crops principally, I had no objection to that; but I did not know that the amendment placed a restriction of $3 per acre upon all other kinds of farming, which would include the principal farming operations in the territory involved in my State.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it was my opinion, in looking over the amendments sent over from the House, that the amendment in question had reference to the other field crops, and I thought it left intact the provisions in the bill in reference to nursery stock and other provisions put in by the Senator from Florida.

I desire to state here now that in view of the action taken in reference to recalling this message from the House, I think it is a question of whether we accept this, which is perhaps doubtful relief, or no relief at all. That is my candid opinion. I have worked in season and out of season to try to get some relief. As every Senator here knows, this was not involved in the joint resolution that I had put through the Senate. The Senate very magnanimously and unanimously voted for the $15,000,000, with provisions in the measure that seemed to be satisfactory to all the representatives of the States affected by the storm. Of course, however, I had no control whatever over its vicissitudes in another body. I did confer with them from time to time, and I found that those who had charge of the matter, representing the States affected, had agreed to this very proposition as the only thing they could get at all.

I do not know just what may be the result of recalling the joint resolution and having it amended or sending it to conference, but it is my opinion that it is either this or nothing at all. I myself was not satisfied with it, but I took occasion yesterday evening to confer with those Senators who were present, and I was advised that perhaps we had better try to work out some relief with the $6,000,000, rather than to get no recognition and no relief at all.

Of course, I want it understood that I would do everything in my power to bring about the relief that was indicated by me on this floor, as necessary, when the original joint resolution passed. The present status is not mine at all. It was what I believed had been worked out by the best efforts of those who were likewise interested on the other side of the Capitol. Perhaps we did not have the difficulties here that they faced over there; and I desire to have my colleagues here thoroughly apprised of my part in the matter and my attitude. It was simply a question in the short time I had, knowing the difficulties that had been encountered elsewhere, of whether or not it was best to take what was offered—scant, imperfect, and perhaps not available, but yet trying to work out with the $6,000,000 some measure of relief rather than none at all. That was my attitude in the whole matter.

SALE OF COTTON AND GRAIN IN FUTURE MARKETS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and still open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. SIMMONS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. LARRAZOLO] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON]; and

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is unavoidably absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am authorized by the Senator from Delaware to say that the general pair which he and I have should not prevent me from voting, as he would vote the same as I have voted.

Mr. BINGHAM. The junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is detained at home on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] are detained on official business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], if present, would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 47, as follows:

So the Senate refused to pass the bill.

Mr. JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will not the Senator yield to me to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill just acted on was defeated?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. May I say that I want to make the motion for the purpose of getting the bill back to the Senate in order that I may offer a substitute, which substitute has already passed the House of Representatives, so as to give the Senate an opportunity to vote upon it. I hope the Senator will not object to this procedure so that we may get a vote on the matter. It will take only a few moments.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hope the Senator from Washington will agree to that. It will not take much time.

Mr. JONES. I wanted to make a motion. I make the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2901, to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Senator will permit me to get a vote on my motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill just acted on was defeated.

Mr. JONES. If the bill I have moved is taken up, it could be temporarily laid aside. I would have no objection to that.

Mr. HARRISON. We can get through with this very quickly. I do not think there will be any great amount of discussion.

Mr. JONES. Very well. Without yielding the floor, I have no objection to the Senator making his motion.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that we recur to the consideration of the bill just voted on, and that I may be permitted to offer an amendment striking out everything after the enacting clause and inserting the following, and the following is the so-called Vinson bill, which has already passed the House unanimously, I may say, which places the cotton exchanges in the same position with reference to deals in cotton as that in which the law now places the board of trade with reference to dealing in grain.

Mr. SMITH. I will ask the Senator from Mississippi to permit me to make a statement just here. There is already on the calendar a bill that is, so far as the amendatory features of the bill are concerned, identical with the one which the Senator proposes to offer, but differs very radically in other particulars. It was my purpose, as soon as this measure was disposed of, to take the bill that has been passed by the House through its regular course through the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and see whether or not we could not work out a plan by which the matter might be expedited, because the parliamentary situation would be such that we could take advantage of the one bill having already passed the House and another one having been reported out by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. We could expedite the matter by getting a bill that would maintain the parliamentary status of the bill that has already passed the House, and also accommodate itself to what is necessary to be done in connection with legislation so important. I had intended to take the floor to make that statement, as I had already stated to other Senators my intent, when the Senator from Mississippi got the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator that I have no objection in the world to that course, but the majority side of the Senate have a program mapped out; certain bills are to come up, and right now is our opportunity either to offer the bill of the Senator from South Carolina as a substitute or to offer the bill that has already passed the House of Representatives. If we do not take advantage of the opportunity now, a measure covering this subject will never become a law during this session of Congress, because we have only about two weeks left. If the Senator can offer his amendment as a substitute, to strike out everything after the enacting clause, I will have no objection to it. That will get it into conference; but let us do something now.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it may be worked out in conference, but this matter is a matter of such far-reaching and grave importance to all of us whose living depends on the production of cotton, that we do not want to take hasty action in reference to that which affects the markets of the great southern staple. I am sure that if the Committee on Agriculture agrees on a measure that is favorable to those interested in the matter, at any time we bring it in here it can be passed. I believe that those on the other side, when we shall have agreed on a measure that will have such a parliamentary status that it can be passed at this session, will grant the right of way at least for a vote on it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I can not yield further.

Mr. HARRISON. I make my motion as a privileged motion.

Mr. JONES. I raise the point that it is not privileged.

Mr. HARRISON. I have a right to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was defeated, when I voted in the negative.

Mr. JONES. The Senator can make the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The entering of the motion is privileged, but whether or not it shall be considered will be determined by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2901.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for a roll call on my proposition. I have entered the motion, and I make the motion now.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that the Senator has not the floor to do that.

Mr. HARRISON. A parliamentary inquiry. If this motion should go over for a day, would we lose our privileged status here of having this bill before the Senate? It is now the unfinished business.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it was voted on, and the vote was completed. The bill was disposed of.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not disposed of.

Mr. JONES. I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2901, to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A bill can be brought before the Senate by a majority vote at any time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Mississippi voted just a moment ago, as others did, on the Caraway bill. He voted in the negative. Therefore under the rules he has the right, having voted on that side, to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was defeated. Why can he not do that now while the bill is still up in the Senate? He obtained recognition, and he wants to make that motion, and I think the Senate ought to act on it while the bill is here, rather than transact some other business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington in the meantime had made a motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2901. That motion was made before the Senator from Mississippi made his motion.

Mr. HARRISON. I have been on my feet——

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Mississippi addressed the Chair two or three times.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Washington was entered and is before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, when the matter of the Senator from Washington shall have been disposed of, will the motion of the Senator from Mississippi take precedence over any other motion? I do not think the Senator from Washington yielded to the Senator from Mississippi, but I wish to submit that the Senator from Mississippi entered a privileged motion, and I think a vote on a privileged motion ought to take precedence over any other motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Such a motion can be entered, but when a motion is entered, the privilege is exhausted. The motion of the Senator from Washington is now before the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. When that shall have been disposed of, does the Chair rule that the next motion in order will be the motion of the Senator from Mississippi?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Mississippi can be taken up during the first morning hour, at the conclusion of morning business.

Mr. HARRISON. There should not be any difficulty about this matter. A unanimous-consent agreement was entered into that at 4 o'clock to-day debate should be limited to 10 minutes. Many of us thought that the bill would not be voted on until after that hour. The Senator from Washington would not lose anything by allowing this motion to be acted on. There is not going to be a great amount of discussion on his measure, and I ask the Senator if he will not withhold his motion so that we can get this matter disposed of at this time?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that the Senator from Washington has signified his willingness to lay his measure aside, and then the Senator from Mississippi can make his motion.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not know that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I arose at the same time the Senator from Washington rose, or preceding him, for the purpose of moving to lay before the Senate House bill 11725, an act to provide for the reapportionment of Congress. But the Senator from Washington obtained recognition and thus secured the floor. I have no desire to draw an issue between the reapportionment bill and the bill which my distinguished friend from Washington is pressing before the Senate and which is a measure I shall favor at the proper time. I would not care to have a division taken upon that particular priority because it would suggest a fictitious disagreement. Therefore I am not going to oppose his motion. But I want to give notice now that as soon as I can obtain the floor after his motion has been carried, as I understand it will be, I intend to seek a vote in the Senate upon considering this reapportionment bill in its own right. I shall do so not on the theory that I am seeking any priority whatever over the bill of the Senator from Washington but that I am undertaking to secure the Senate's judgment as to whether or not a paramount degree of constitutional privilege, equivalent to that which is given to appropriation measures, does not and should not and must not attach to a measure that involves the fundamental rights of 32,000,000 comparatively disfranchised American citizens, and which involves the ultimate constitutional validity of future presidential electoral colleges, and which involves the validity, perhaps, of the very act of Congress itself because of the fact that it is organized contrary to the constitutional mandate, and which involves the sanctity of the Constitution itself and the validity of the oath which Senators in this Chamber take when they assume their seats. I can conjure no other legislation which so fundamentally involves the root sources of our representative Government. Therefore, I submit, no other legislation has so vivid a claim upon the Senate's attention.

I shall have to ask the Senate to take the responsibility for any further postponement of a measure so basically constitutional in its character and so obviously challenging to this body. It is challenging to the Senate with particular emphasis because of the fact that it was this body eight years ago which refused to accept and validate a similar act of reapportionment from the House of Representatives and at that time adroitly took the measure down a blind alley and cut the Constitution's throat. So far as I am concerned I can not take the responsibility, as the Senator in charge of the bill upon the floor, for subjecting this constitutionally privileged measure any longer to the hazards of filibuster and of the Senate calendar congestion during the final two weeks of the session and the possibility that it may suffer another anæsthetic. Therefore, although I do not, I repeat, oppose the immediate motion of the Senator from Washington, yet I shall undertake as soon as I can obtain the floor after his motion is put, to move the consideration of this constitutionally privileged measure, and thus obtain the Senate's judgment as to whether it considers the unofficial party program of an unofficial party committee more binding and more authoritative than a constitutional mandate which already has been ruthlessly ignored for eight sterile years.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, with a comparable degree of earnestness, but with much less misdirected vehemence, I want to give notice that I shall ask the Senate, after the disposal of the bill of which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is in charge, to take up and consider the bill (H. R. 8298) authorizing acquisition of a site for the farmers' produce market, and for other purposes, which has been upon the calendar since the 3d of April last.

I may say incidentally that I would regard it as a distinct violation of faith if any other bill were permitted to intervene and further postpone the consideration of that bill, because I have deferred bringing it up upon the assurance of those having charge of the business program of the Senate that the bill would be included in the next group of bills to be considered by the Senate. It may be regarded as more or less a local bill, but it is not as apt as the bill of the Senator from Michigan to proceed to cut the Constitution's throat again.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I am in entire agreement with the Senator from Virginia as to maintaining orderly procedure, but I think he is mistaken in assuming that the bill of which he has charge, H. R. 8298, would be the next bill in order as arranged by the committee on procedure.

Mr. GLASS. Possibly so. I am in favor of orderly procedure, of course. If the Senator's measure is ahead of mine, that is all right, and I am in favor of considering his bill first, of course.

Mr. EDGE. I was quite sure that was the Senator's attitude, and I simply wanted to invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal precedes his bill.

Mr. GLASS. Very well. Let us consider that and let us then consider my bill.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Washington if he will now submit his request to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business?

Mr. JONES. I would like, first, to get a vote on the question of whether it shall be made the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2901) to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we are now in the condition in which we always find ourselves near the end of every short session of Congress. The time we are taking up now to decide on a program is time lost. Even the time that I am using is time lost, but I think it is well to lose a little more time in order to call attention of the Senate and of the country, and particularly of the House of Representatives to the fact that we are confronted with a condition now which confronts us every two years, because the Senate must adjourn on the 4th day of March with a calendar crowded with more important legislation than can possibly be considered between now and then.

We all know that the larger portion of the legislation now on our calendar is going to be left unconsidered because of a lack of time, and that when noon of the 4th of March comes those measures, some of which have taken up the time of committees and Senators for weeks in their preparation and consideration, must all die; that all the work put upon them will be lost, and that at another session of Congress if an attempt is made to legislate upon any of those subjects we must commence at the beginning.

If the House of Representatives had approved and given the legislatures of the States an opportunity to approve the so-called "lame duck" amendment to the Constitution of the United States, we would not be confronted with the illogical condition in which we find ourselves now. It will always be that way until the Constitution is changed, until we get rid of the short session of Congress. The particular dilemma in which Congress and the country find themselves now will recur two years from now unless the Constitution shall be amended in the meantime. It will happen every two years thereafter as long as the Constitution and the country stand. It will get worse every two years. As the country grows in population and in business the legislation will then become more important even than it is now.

It will be said, "Why, some of the legislation pending in the various committees and some of it now on the calendar, to which committees have devoted a great deal of time, might very well be permitted to die there. It would be better if every one of those measures were not enacted into law. There is controversy about them." It is true that they are controversial. It is probable that every one of them has two sides and that those who are opposed to them would rather not see them enacted into law. But what is Congress for except to settle controversial questions of legislation? If we are to enact nothing into law except by unanimous consent, we ought to abolish the Congress almost entirely. There is no necessity for the taxpayers of the country paying the enormous expenses connected with the Congress if we are not to settle controversial questions. That is what we are here for, and that is the reason why we ought to settle them. But under existing conditions we can not do it because it is a physical impossibility.

The situation has become such that when we presume to ask a question about an appropriation bill and the debate on some important item in an appropriation bill runs along for an hour or two, where hundreds of millions of dollars of the public money is involved, we are at once reminded, "Why, we must get along; we can not debate this so long. We must not consider it at such great length. We will not get it through by the 4th of March if we do." We have been reminded of such a condition at least fifty times during the present session and will be reminded of it from now on until the 4th of March every day, and yet, without that change of the Constitution which I have proposed we are helpless.

There is no filibuster. It is a well-known principle that commencing to-day any reasonable number of Senators could defeat any legislation without undertaking to fight it, not because they could keep up a filibuster until the 4th of March but because those behind the bill would realize that every moment is precious and that the bill would take up so much time that other bills still more important would not be given consideration.

Not only does this condition of affairs result, but it interferes with the orderly and logical work of every standing committee of the Senate. When we are half way or more through the short session the committees commence to get busy. They call special meetings, and those meetings conflict one with the other, with the result that half of the committees find themselves without a quorum, with important legislation before them for consideration. Senators are not to blame. They are on several committees and can not be in two places at once. In other words, it is like a room full of men who have to pass out of a door where it is known in advance that only one-third of them can get out, and yet they are all trying to get out at once, with the result that no one gets out. That is what happens to legislation. It is not only the consumption of time in the consideration of the bills in the case of a filibuster, but it is after that in the jam that we are called upon to do things that are impossible of accomplishment.

I could not permit this opportunity to pass by without calling attention to the real condition and the real evil that is behind the deplorable condition in which we now find ourselves.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2901) to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I want to make a proposition to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and that is that he shall not insist upon his bill being taken up now. I am perfectly willing that it should be set down for some hour to-morrow or any other day that suits the Senator from Washington, and that debate on it be limited, but it is not convenient for me and it is not convenient, I am sure, for at least one other Member of this body who is opposed to the bill to take up discussion of it to-day. I am perfectly willing it shall be set down for any particular hour to-morrow or on any subsequent day, and the time for discussion limited, but I will advise the Senator, though I am hardly in a position to give any advice to him, that he accept this suggestion of mine, because, as he well knows, this is a subject upon which I experience no difficulty in speaking at very considerable length, even when I have no desire to filibuster it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I would be perfectly willing if an agreement can be made so that the bill may be called up to-morrow. I would be perfectly willing to enter into an agreement of that kind. If we can take the bill up at 12 o'clock to-morrow and vote on it later in the day. I am perfectly willing to agree to vote not later than half past 2.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator would hardly expect me to expose the iniquities of the bill in that time?

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the Senator to suggest a time to-morrow to vote.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest that we take up the bill to-morrow and let us have a little debate on it before we agree on a time to vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. Let us take it up the first thing when we meet to-morrow. Let us proceed to the consideration of the bill immediately after 12 o'clock, which we could do by taking a recess this evening.

Mr. BRUCE. I have no disposition to filibuster, none whatever. I merely want to have an opportunity to discuss the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest that the measure be taken up so as to become the unfinished business, and then be temporarily laid aside so the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and that it be agreed that the bill of the Senator from Washington shall not be taken up before 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BRUCE. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. JONES. I would like to couple with that an agreement at not later than a certain hour to-morrow we shall vote on the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Washington if it is the bill (S. 2901) to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, to which he refers?

Mr. JONES. Yes; it is.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I ask just one question respecting it? Does that make any offense under the prohibition act a felony?

Mr. JONES. It creates no new offenses; it merely provides for an additional penalty in certain cases. It does not expressly create a penalty, but prescribes an increased penalty.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It raises the maximum penalty.

Mr. JONES. It raises the maximum penalty and leaves the minimum penalty unaffected.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But it does not create any new penalties.

Mr. JONES. It does not.

Mr. BORAH. Or any new offenses.

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, so far as I know there are only a few Members of the Senate who are opposed to this bill who desire to discuss it. I think the Senator need have no fear that debate on it will be unduly protracted; so that I think the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas is one which the Senator from Washington might well accept.

Mr. JONES. I am willing to have the bill made the unfinished business, and then let it go over until 2 o'clock to-morrow, with the understanding, without probably an express agreement, that we shall dispose of it to-morrow.

Mr. BRUCE. I could not say that, because I desire to discuss the bill; and, as I have said, while I have no desire unduly to obstruct the passage of the bill——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BRUCE. I desire to speak on it, and I happen to know that some other Senators also desire to speak on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, have I not the right to discuss my views about the motion? I most assuredly intend to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is debatable.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I thought the understanding was that the bill, if made the unfinished business, would go over until to-morrow.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Washington will consent to the suggestion which has been made.

Mr. JONES. I was going to agree to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is not as yet before the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington, and that motion is debatable. The Senator from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think we can reach an agreement with the Senator after the vote is had on taking up the bill.

Mr. BRUCE. After the bill has been taken up?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BRUCE. I am sure we can.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2901) to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I should be glad to have the bill temporarily laid aside, with the understanding that we will take it up at 2 o'clock to-morrow and dispose of it, as nearly as possible.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I can enter into no agreement which will prevent the roll call for which I am asking on the question of determining whether the Senate desires longer to postpone consideration of the reapportionment bill.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. VANDENBERG and Mr. HARRISON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11725.

Mr. HARRISON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire, first, is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington that the unfinished business shall be temporarily laid aside? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I had understood that after the bill had been taken up I would be permitted to make a motion.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, have I the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11725, and upon that question I ask for a roll call.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the understanding was that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] was to be recognized when the bill of the Senator from Washington was out of the way or some agreement reached concerning it. That was my understanding, and I think it was the understanding of other Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was no agreement or understanding. The Chair has to recognize the Senator first addressing the Chair, and that is the reason why the Chair recognized the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Mississippi has been standing on his feet for some time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay the business of the Senate. Let us have a yea-and-nay vote on the motion now.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very well.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, there will be some debate on that motion.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to debate it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JONES. If the motion of the Senator from Michigan shall be adopted, as I understand, it will displace the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will displace the unfinished business.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I wish to speak very briefly on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, which is now before the Senate. I want to make it very clear that so far as the measure which the Senator has in charge is concerned, the so-called reapportionment bill, I am heartily in favor of it, and I have every wish and hope and expectation that the Senate will pass the measure before final adjournment. Nevertheless, as has been indicated by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], we have a system which has been in vogue in the Senate for many years, which recognizes a committee known as the committee on procedure of order of business. That committee considers the requests of Members of the Senate representing both political parties, and decides in its judgment the order in which the Senate shall consider various measures that have been on the calendar or before the Senate for a long time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I asked him one question?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I merely want to make it plain that the motion I am making raises the fundamental point as to whether the committee on order of business of the Senate has a superior right to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the question of constitutionality. I repeat that the bill the Senator has in charge is a very important measure, and I have no doubt that it will receive the final consideration of the Senate before the Congress shall adjourn, but the committee on program, I repeat, has been recognized for years as an instrumentality to maintain an orderly procedure. In other words, it affords Members of the Senate who, as the chairmen of committees or as the sponsors for various measures, have the responsibility of looking after them, an opportunity, known to some extent in advance, to be prepared to move their consideration and have them debated and finally disposed of by the Senate.

Demonstrating that the policy of the committee has always been to recognize both sides of the Chamber, I merely wish to call attention to the present program. There are four bills on the program. The first bill is the one of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], which has just been disposed of. The second bill is that of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], which is now the unfinished business. The third measure is the joint resolution sponsored by myself as chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. The fourth bill is that referred to by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. So two bills which have been placed on the program are being handled by members of the Democratic Party and two are being handled by members of the Republican Party.

In my judgment, either we must maintain the responsibility of the committee on procedure, or there should be no such committee. Either we should go through with the program or, I repeat, the committee should be discharged. In my judgment, the three bills that remain on the program, with debate directed to the subject matter, could be disposed of in two or three days.

We have still over two weeks remaining of the session, and there seems to be no adequate reason why the reapportionment bill should not come up in the regular way and be given proper consideration by the Senate. But certainly this is the test—not the test as to the constitutionality of any measure or of any disposition to challenge the Constitution—of the necessity of deciding by the Senate whether we will proceed in an orderly manner under a method of procedure which has been accepted for many years, or whether suddenly we are going to have a grab and grasp and hustle on the part of this or that or the other Senator to have one bill made the unfinished business one moment and displaced the next.

We are under the criticism of the country—some of it justified, in my opinion, and much of it unjustified—as to the time consumed to transact business. Certainly we will add to the confusion if we deliberately do away with this established, recognized method through which we can approach different measures, prepare to debate them, and be in a position to expect those measures to be before the Senate within a reasonable time.

So, for that reason, Mr. President, much as I am interested in the reapportionment bill, I propose to uphold the traditions of the Senate, the rules of the Senate, the recognized practice of the Senate, and vote against the motion of the Senator from Michigan to displace the unfinished business.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have not been ordered.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want again to call attention to the same situation to which I called attention a few moments ago. We are killing time; even I am doing that now, in order that I may call the attention of the country to just what is going on in the Senate on account of the failure of the House of Representatives to pass the so-called "lame duck" amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. President, I am in favor of taking up the bill which the Senator from Michigan has in charge. If he had been recognized and had moved to take up the bill and the Senate had adopted his motion, I would have voted against the motion of the Senator from Washington to take up the other bill. I am in favor of both of the bills, but if we go from one to the other we will not secure action on either one of them; neither one of them will get out of the door before the 4th of March.

We are all in an embarrassing position; those, at least, who feel as I do, that both of these bills ought to be enacted into law. We are under the necessity, in order to do anything, to vote against taking up one or the other of them if their adherents continue to make motions to take one up and displace the other. So, while I shall vote on the roll call which is about to take place against the motion of the Senator from Michigan, I shall not do so because I am opposed to his bill; but because I am confronted with the fact that if I shall vote to take up that bill and if the motion should prevail it would displace another bill which is now already before the Senate and of which I am in favor.

Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] entirely. Usually I do, but on this occasion I do not entirely agree with him in his argument that the unofficial committee on order of business to which he has referred, which is not recognized by the Rules of the Senate, shall say to the Senate what its order of procedure shall be. Under the rules the Senator from Michigan is in order in making the motion he has made.

I am not against this unofficial committee; perhaps it does much good; I only reserve the right, when they place a bill on the program for consideration which I would rather not have considered, to vote to take up some other measure when I get an opportunity to do so. I do not mean any disrespect to the committee, and no disrespect can possibly, or rightfully at least, be implied by such a vote. The committee, as I have said, is an unofficial one. Its object is to bring order out of chaos, if it can, but at the same time the committee must submit its work to the Senate, which in that instance is the supreme court. The members of the committee are merely justices of the peace, and not even official justices of the peace; they have not taken the oath of office, so far as their committee is concerned, even to support the Constitution. That is the reason the Senator from New Jersey, perhaps, disregards the Constitution as he does defiantly in the face of the constitutional argument of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I am in the same situation as is the Senator from Nebraska in being in favor of both motions, but I am rather impressed with the conviction that the bill of the Senator from Washington has strength enough behind it to be passed, even if we do not take it up at once.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may be entirely right about that.

Mr. FESS. For that reason I am rather inclined to vote for the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Ohio may be entirely right; his reasoning satisfies him certainly, and I am not finding fault with it, because I think he is taking what, from his viewpoint, is a perfectly logical position. I, myself, do not feel that I should vote to displace a bill that I am in favor of by another one that I am also in favor of unless the second bill is a great deal more important.

It may be that the Senator's bill is the more important. I would not say that it is not; but, personally, I feel very much in favor of both of them.

After listening to the conversation between the Senator from Washington and those who are opposed to his bill I do not believe the bill is going to take very much time. I hope it will not. I think we will be able to dispose of it without much debate, and then I hope we can take up the bill that the Senator from Michigan advocates. I think he makes a mistake, however, when he makes his motion now to take it up.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senate has just voted to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2901, increasing maximum penalties for violation of the prohibition law. Before any debate on the measure has occurred following the vote, a motion is made now to proceed to the consideration of a bill which everyone knows will call for much discussion.

I do not object to the consideration of the bill proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]; but I do object to what must appear to be unusual, inexcusable, and absurd procedure, namely, voting to take up a measure and then immediately voting to pass from its consideration to the consideration of another measure. If the Senate establishes that precedent during the closing days of this session, the greater part of our time, instead of being devoted to legislation, to deliberation upon measures, will be required for passing upon motions to take up bills.

Nothing whatever is to be accomplished by any such practice. There is nothing in the present situation to indicate that the bill brought forward by the Senator from Washington will require prolonged debate. It presents a simple issue. According to the report of the committee, the maximum penalty for violations of the prohibition laws is now so small that professional bootleggers, who earn enormous sums from their illegitimate traffic, openly violate the law, pay the fines imposed under the present law, and proceed with their business.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas, however, to the fact that the application of this bill is not limited to bootleggers.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; it could not well be limited to any one class of violators of the prohibition law; but the provisions of the bill, as I understand them—and I will ask the Senator from Washington to correct me if I am in error—make no material change in existing law except in enlarging the maximum penalty for violations of the prohibition law. Is that correct?

Mr. JONES. That is correct. That is, the bill increases the penalties for violations of the express things mentioned in the Constitution itself. It amounts to the same thing that the Senator has stated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Well, it is the same thing?

Mr. JONES. Yes. It does not affect the minimum penalties at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; but it does give a court the power to impose upon a violator of the prohibition law a penalty that is calculated to restrain him from future violations of the law.

What does a bootlegger who makes a million dollars a year out of his dishonest and unlawful practice care for the payment of a fine of a thousand dollars? It is true that the same argument would apply in some degree to the enlarged penalty carried in this case.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. But it would make considerable difference to a man who took a drink to which the incident of transportation was attached to be sent to the penitentiary for five years or to be fined $5,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes. The existence of maximum and minimum penalties always implies in the courts enforcing the law discretion in the imposition of penalties; and it is also true that there have been cases, and there probably will be other cases, in which the discretion has been abused and excessive penalties have been imposed; but my point is that it is necessary and essential from the standpoint of those who believe in law enforcement, whether they favor prohibition or oppose it as a principle, to permit the imposition of penalties adequate to restrain violations of the law.

The questions involved in this bill can not require very lengthy debate except from those who desire to employ what are known as filibustering tactics. The Senate ought not to vote one minute to take up this measure, and then, before it has been considered for any length of time, vote to proceed to the consideration of another measure. It is inefficiency of the worst form, and it is not justifiable from the standpoint of either those who favor the legislation or those who oppose the legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reapportionment bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). My colleague [Mr. HOWELL] is detained from the Senate by reason of illness.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRATTON. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the general pair of the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. LARRAZOLO] with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] are absent on official business.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is necessarily detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea" on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—23

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2901) to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and modified.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in the interest of saving time I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, in the Army and Navy Journal, the issue of February 9 last, a statement is made which I shall read, and I desire to direct the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to it. It is as follows:

> Perhaps in Senator BLACK'S attitude on the cruisers is found an explanation of his unwillingness to promote the efficiency of the Army by facilitating the passage of the imperatively needed promotion legislation.

I simply desire to say in connection with that that I have endeavored to get up promotion legislation since the early part of the last session, and I have endeavored in every way to facilitate it. I am anxious now to obtain such legislation, and I am very hopeful that within the next few days the Congress will enact it. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if he will not make a statement with reference to this.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. May we have order, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It would not be fair to the Senator from Alabama to allow the statement to go unchallenged that he is responsible for delay in action on Army promotion legislation. He is not any more responsible for the delay than I have been or than those who agree with me about it have been.

The situation, in a word, is that we are all agreed that some action must be taken. The Senator's ideas as to what action should be taken do not agree with ours. On both sides we have been trying in good faith to work out a compromise, and the delay during the past month has been almost exclusively due to that and partly to the fact that some of us were so busy in Appropriations Committee work that we were unable to put as much time on it as we should have.

I think that statement is due to the Senator in justice to him. I know that he is anxious, as I am, to get some action during this session of Congress on the promotion situation, because he feels, as I do, that it presents a serious crisis in the affairs of the Army.

NATIONAL ORIGINS

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the RECORD a statement made by representatives of the American Legion before the Immigration Committee of the Senate in its consideration of the national origins matter last week.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Statement of John Thomas Taylor, vice chairman national legislative commitee, American Legion, before the Senate Committee on Immigration, February 9, 1929, setting forth the Legion's opposition to the Nye resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 192

Following the World War, members of the American Legion had it brought home to themselves forcibly that the so-called melting pot had not melted sufficiently to form a harmonious nation. In order to give the melting pot a chance to fuse the varied strains of racial origins within our shores, the Legion then advocated total restriction of immigration for a period of years. The Legion continued this attitude until the passage of the immigration act of 1924. Since the passage of this act, the Legion had indorsed it and upheld its provisions for the following reasons:

(1) The Legion believes firmly in restrictive immigration. We believe that this is our country, and that we are entitled to be the judge of whether we shall allow people to come here from foreign countries to make their home with us, or to say to them, "We now have sufficient persons of other races within our shores."

(2) As we favor restrictive immigration, the question of how the immigrants should be chosen is of paramount importance. The selection of immigrants upon the basis of the foreign-born population resident in America at any selected date is manifestly unjust, and opens such a basis to the charge of discrimination. This discrimination must inevitably exist, regardless of the census upon which it may be based.

(3) The theory of the national origins of the entire population of the United States is therefore the fairest basis upon which immigration quotas may be based. It comprehends our entire population, just as the selective service act of 1917 included the entire young manhood of the Nation, regardless of race or creed.

(4) During the World War 2,000,000 persons resident in America of foreign birth claimed exemption under the draft because of their alienage. Yet should we continue to base our quotas upon the foreign-born population, the countries of which these slackers are natives would be allowed to send additional immigrants to America on their account, although no account would be taken in immigration quotas of the native-born Americans who responded so admirably to the call of their country.

Page 90, Table 23, of the Second Report of the Provost Marshal General, 1919, shows that 1,703,000 aliens were registered in the draft up to September 11, 1918. Page 452 of the same book, paragraphs E and F, shows that 914,950 aliens were deferred and exempted because of their alienage. These were:

Alien enemy exempted	334,949
Resident alien, not enemy, claiming exemption	580,003
Total	914,952

This was more than one-half—to be exact, 53 per cent—of those registered, claimed exemption, or were exempted or placed in a deferred classification because of their alienage and were never called.

What better argument for the national-origins provision could possibly be advanced?

The issue can be brought squarely between patriotism and slackerism. Shall slackerism be represented in selecting our immigrants over patriotism?

The American Legion has more than 860,000 members and our auxiliary 350,000 members. We number within our membership all races, creeds, and nationalities. It is a cross-cut of the Nation. We are not the advocates of immigration from any special nation or groups of nations, but we emphatically uphold the theory underlying the national-origins provision which is that immigration quotas based upon the entire population of the Nation, is not only the fairest method for selecting immigrants but is the most certain method of retaining for the future the blend of population and racial mixtures as they exist in America to-day.

The national-origins provision is a part of the basic law of the act of 1924. The temporary basing of the quotas upon the census of 1890 was an arbitrary expedient placed in the law until such time as—and only until—the national-origins provision could become effective. This required additional study, in order to determine the quotas which would be provided under it.

The charge has been made that national origins as a basis for quota immigration is unworkable. Nothing could be further from the truth than this statement. The Congress can set up arbitrary quotas for any foreign countries, regardless of population and census figures—can choose immigrants or exclude them as it sees fit.

Any system of selecting immigrants based upon the foreign-born population, at any particular period, is open to the charge of discrimination, and justly so. But to base these quotas upon the national origins of the entire Nation can not be open to the charge of discrimination, for under such a plan the newest immigrant coming to our shores stands upon the same footing as the descendants of those who came here 300 years ago and founded this Nation in the wilderness.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Farrell, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to each of the following bills:

H. R. 5491. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1921; and

H. R. 13795. An act for recognition of meritorious service performed by Lieut. Commander Edward Ellsberg, Lieut. Henry Hartley, and Boatswain Richard E. Hawes.

SALE OF COTTON AND GRAIN IN FUTURE MARKETS

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which Senate bill 1093 was defeated be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say a word in explanation of this motion? I did not think that anyone would object to it.

I was of the impression, and I am sure that other Senators were, because this bill covers a subject in which we are all interested, that there would be an amendment offered to the Caraway bill that would incorporate the so-called Vinson bill, which passed the House of Representatives, dealing with the cotton exchanges, putting them under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. Indeed, an amendment was printed and was on the table to that effect.

We entered into a unanimous-consent agreement providing that after 4 o'clock to-day the debate would be limited to 10 minutes upon the bill, and so on. But the debate was concluded, and some of us happened to be inadvertently out of the Chamber, and the vote was being taken when we came in. So it seems to me that we ought to have a vote upon this amendment. No harm can come from it, and the Senators can express themselves about it. Otherwise there will be no legislation touching this subject at this session of Congress. I say this in explanation of the motion I have made. I hope that the motion will be agreed to and that I can offer the amendment then in the Senate carrying out the action the House took with reference to the matter.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I understand that the Senator's amendment proposes to extend to the cotton exchanges the control that is in effect on the grain exchanges.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. DILL. I want to make this comment, that if it does not help the cotton farmer any more than that control has helped the wheat farmer it is not worth the time it is taking to discuss it.

Mr. HARRISON. It may not help them; but the Department of Agriculture is supposed to be the friend of the agricultural interests of the country, and the amendment would give them jurisdiction of the cotton exchanges, just as they have jurisdiction now over the board of trade dealing in grain.

Mr. DILL. The gambling has gone on in the grain market, if anything, worse than it did before that control was given.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington is entirely mistaken in his characterization——

Mr. DILL. I do not think I am.

Mr. GLASS. Because a New York newspaper says that any Senator who calls speculation gambling is an ass.

Mr. DILL. Of course, if a New York paper says that, I consider the origin of the statement.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I wish Senators to listen to me just a moment. We have been discussing a bill here which has been, as I suggested in my remarks, before the American Congress around 50 years. We devoted our time pretty thoroughly to a discussion of whether the Caraway bill should pass or not. Now the idea is to take up a great piece of legislation, there being 32 pages of the bill, and vote on it without knowing what we are doing. We have not discussed it at all, we do not know anything about it, and I for one am unwilling to vote on a measure of this kind as a substitute for the Caraway bill without knowing what I am doing.

I have not studied this particular bill. I know something about a bill which was similar in some respects, and was reported favorably to this body by the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate, which is known as the Smith bill, but the evils which that bill sought to correct have been very largely corrected by the voluntary action of the New York Cotton Exchange. To a very great extent those evils are behind us, and that exchange, I believe, is trying in good faith to correct that trouble.

The junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE], in my judgment, made a very wise remark about this question a day or two ago. It is extremely brief, and I want to read it to the Senate so that Senators may have it before them when they vote on this matter. He said:

> Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to what has been said with reference to the Federal Reserve Board and the cotton exchanges. I think if it would be in order it would be a good idea for the Senate to send all bills relative to these matters back to a special committee consisting of Members of the House and the Senate from the cotton-growing States and let them agree among themselves. Possibly if they could do that, the Representatives from the other parts of the country might be able to help solve the problem; but so long as the Representatives from the Southern States, which grow cotton, are so wide apart as they are to-day as to what is best in the interest of the cotton farmer, it seems to me that it is going to be rather difficult, indeed, to find a solution.

I commend that to the careful attention of the Senate, and I also wish to have Senators consider the fact that we have not considered this proposed substitute. If we reconsider the vote by which the Caraway bill was defeated, and the substitute comes before us, I say in all frankness that it will have to be thoroughly debated, it will have to be thoroughly considered, before I for one can consent to a vote upon it. Do not imagine that a vote could be had this afternoon or to-morrow on this question. It is exceedingly important. The Vinson bill is a measure of 32 pages, which has not been considered by any committee of the Senate. How can Senators act on a matter of such great importance without consideration?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I am not rising to discuss this measure. However, I am not going to permit to go unchallenged the statement that the cotton exchanges have abolished the evils incident to their operation. They only made it easier for those who gamble upon the exchanges to protect themselves than was the case prior to the change in the rules.

Take the matter of southern delivery. Every living man who knows cotton from cows knows the action in regard to that was not in the interest of the growers of cotton. It is absolutely impossible for anybody to deliver under it, but it is easier for somebody to tender, and therefore break a high price. A man never tenders except when the future prices are higher than the spot cotton and he wants to break the market, and then he tenders. The change will relieve Anderson, Clayton & Co. from the necessity of keeping $10,000,000 worth of cotton in New York, and paying $500,000 a year for storage and insurance in order to have something to break the price whenever it looks as though a cotton grower might get something approaching the cost of production.

They abolished their rule, so that Clayton, Anderson & Co. will not have to bring cotton to New York, in order to keep from having his shirt taken off them, as one of them said in the hearings before the Senate committee; not that they can not take the shirts off the cotton growers, because they can do it now with less money than they could before. That is all there is of this correcting of evils. The only thing they did was to make it more advantageous to the man who wanted to gamble.

I am not surprised at the vote on my bill a moment ago. I want to assert that not one out of five who voted against the bill ever read it. They got their information out of the cloakrooms from lobbyists. They took their orders from the gamblers on the stock and cotton and grain exchanges, and came here and recorded it. That is all they did. They never fooled anybody. If I had a boy 4 or 5 years old and he could have been mistaken about this issue, I would put him in a school for the feeble-minded, because he could not learn anywhere else.

They knew who their masters were, and they responded to them. Somebody may now want to excuse himself by saying, "I was for some other measure." He is not going to fool anybody about that, either.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, a vast deal of the speculation going on now takes not only the farmer's shirt off but it takes the skin off him also. [Laughter.] I am aware of the fact that my friend from Louisiana is not going to enthuse over any measure that seeks to regulate these exchanges rigidly.

I am reminded of a story told in the House once by Congressman Cushman. He said that in the old days in the State of Washington they would hang a horse thief wherever they found him, and they would put a placard on his back saying, "This man is a horse thief, and if you steal a horse you know what is going to happen to you."

They broke horse stealing up for nearly a year, but finally another horse thief came around and stole a horse, and the citizens got hold of him, took him out on a beautiful, moonlight night. They had a plow line tied around his wrists, and about half of the neighbors present wanted to hang him and half of them wanted to shoot him. They discussed in his presence what method they would employ to execute him. Some one said that he thought it would be better to shoot him. Another suggested that he was in favor of hanging him. He wanted to hang him up by the roadside and put a card on his back as a warning to others who wanted to steal horses. Well, they discussed it pro and con, and grew very much excited. Those who wanted to shoot him insisted that he be shot. Those who wanted to hang him insisted that he should be hung.

Finally one very kindly disposed fellow said, "I think we ought to consult him and get his 'ruthers' about it and see which plan he would prefer." So they turned to him and said, "Stranger, you have heard the discussion. Which'd you ruther we would do, hang you or shoot you?" "Well," he said, "I be more interested than ary one of you, but I cain't enthuse over ary one of the plans suggested." [Laughter.]

That is the situation with my friend from Louisiana. He is not going to enthuse over either one of these strict regulatory plans.

Mr. President, I think we ought to have an opportunity to vote on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, and I hope it will prevail. If the motion does prevail, I wish to state that we will have an opportunity to vote on the amendment which the Senator from Mississippi wants to offer, known as the Vinson bill, which has already passed the House, and we will have an opportunity to vote on the Smith bill, which has a number of very fine provisions in it. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] prepared the bill after we made the investigation into cotton prices last spring, when he was chairman of the investigating committee, and the members were the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], and myself. We were all members of the committee that made the investigation. We touched on many of the evils complained of, which were disclosed by the testimony.

Personally, I would prefer to have the measure introduced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] rather than the Vinson bill. In the event the Vinson bill is the only one offered at this time I would vote for that, since the Caraway bill has been defeated. But the measure which I now hold in my hand, being the bill of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], is already on the calendar.

Senators, we ought to do something with this matter and we ought to do it now. The cotton-selling season is practically over. If we enact one of these measures into law now, it will give us from now until next August to get adjusted to the new order of things, and the machinery that we have now can be regulated under the new law. I sincerely hope that the Senate will vote to reconsider the matter, and let us try out one of these measures and apply it to the exchanges which are now robbing the farmers right and left under the kind of speculation that goes on from day to day.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think the Senate begins to appreciate some of the questions that will be involved if this matter is reopened on the floor of the Senate. Reference was made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and I believe also by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], to the effect that as a result of the investigation carried on last year it was agreed by all parties concerned, including the exchanges themselves and those who day by day use the exchanges, that there were certain practices which made it very easy or comparatively easy for the cotton markets to be manipulated. We have heard a great deal here about paper contracts and about the effect of the extraordinary selling of fictitious cotton. Curiously enough the selling of vast quantities of fictitious cotton has not always been, if at any time, immediately responsible for those violent fluctuations; but they came about actually on account of the presence of the spot cotton.

The situation arose from the fact that New York, the great central American market, was always considered a spot market and a differential had to be applied to the price of cotton which obtained in the South in order to deliver it in New York. Parties buy cotton with reference to what was known as "notice day," which is the day on which the party selling the cotton would give notice that he intended to deliver—not to settle on margin, but to deliver the actual spot cotton. It might not be to the advantage of the individual to take it up to New York and he would prefer to have that as the place of hedge or insurance, and purchase his cotton in the South. That condition might go on until, when there was an absence of cotton, some one would attempt to corner the market and put the price up, knowing that the party selling could not deliver the spot if the spot were demanded; and on the other hand, if there was an excess of cotton in this unadvantageous place he might tender it when it was not practical for the party buying the contract to take up the cotton.

Therefore it was contended that New York not being in a geographical position to handle the spot transaction, it affected disastrously the market. There was a clamor all over the country that we should have southern delivery, making the contract in New York and allowing the seller to deliver where the cotton was available and where there was always a supply of every grade of cotton and of what is called line cotton—that is, the grade that was tenderable in New York under the present law. The New York Cotton Exchange, after years and years of refusing to do so, have adopted that plan as a part of their constitution.

It also was made apparent that the party holding contracts for a given month would transfer them to another month, and to still another month, and still hold the same amount of contracts to influence the market. That was called to the attention of the exchange, and they have incorporated in their rules and regulations a provision that there shall not be the retendering from one month to another of the same contract for the purpose of influencing the price of cotton.

There was also brought to light the fact that parties would buy contracts in one market and sell a like number in another market, and straddle between the two markets. Those who were powerful enough would buy in one market until they put it out of parity with the other in which they had sold a preponderance on the market. That was called to the attention of the exchanges, and they now make it a misdemeanor under their rules and regulations, making the party who indulges in the practice liable to expulsion, so that one buying in a market can not sell a like amount in another market for the purpose of what they call "straddling," artificially influencing the market, and thereby giving rise to an unjust effect on the market.

The next and most important proposition was providing against the tendering and retendering in the same month in the same market of the same cotton.

The New York Exchange have incorporated these provisions in their by-laws and in their rules and regulations. I am not going to question the good faith of those men who testified before the committee that this was done under the demand of the entire trade. I shall not question whether they have incorporated these provisions in good faith or whether it is a mere gesture, but I do submit that if they have done it in good faith on their own motion they are more likely to carry them out faithfully than if we were to undertake to enforce them by law, because, as we all know, the laws which we enact are very often used as a means to avoid accomplishing the very purpose which they were intended to accomplish.

The reforms which have been incorporated voluntarily or on the motion of the exchange itself were incorporated in a bill which, after consideration by the committee, was submitted to the Senate and placed on the calendar. I want to state, Mr. President, that I feel that my judgment has been vindicated as to the effect the cotton futures act, which is now the law of the land, would have on the trade. We found that long before ever I came here an abuse had existed of storing in certain warehouses in New York certain cotton that was not considered merchantable in the common acceptation of the term. This cotton was held there, and when a contract was sold the party owning the cotton would tender it at a price that could not be obtained in the open market. It was what Mr. Herbert Knox Smith, who was appointed by the Congress to investigate the abuses on the exchange, termed as the "fixed difference in price." The basis middling of a certain staple and grade was the basis upon which cotton was sold. The party selling had the right to deliver any cotton that was called commercial cotton which went from what was in common parlance known as dog-tail to middling fair. It took in all cotton regardless of the staple and regardless of grade, so that one owning a certain amount of that undesirable cotton would have the right to tender it on contract at an absurd value which the purchaser of the contract could not afford to take because he could not realize on it either by delivering it to the mills or by offering it in the open market.

The cotton futures act, of which I had the honor to be the original author, prescribed that nothing below a certain length of staple and a certain grade in color could be tendered on contract, so that undesirable low-grade cotton was entirely eliminated. It provided further that in case the cotton was delivered and the actual spot taken up and the purchaser was dissatisfied or had doubt as to whether it was of the grade and staple contemplated by law, machinery should be set in action in the Department of Agriculture by which both the grade and the staple could be determined and the price determined by taking the average of a given number of bona fide spot markets as to what that grade and staple brought the day the tender was made, so that the purchaser would be protected in grade, staple, and price.

That law went into effect and it has been working admirably so far as buyer and seller are concerned. There were necessary amendments from time to time. We had to restrict the number of grades, and we finally restricted them to a given number, providing that nothing below low middling in quality and nothing below seven-eighths in staple should be tenderable at any time on the exchange. I think Europe recognizes that standard and that it has been adopted the entire world over as being a fair basis upon which to do business. It was decided upon for this reason:

There is not in all the world a man producing cotton who can tell what grade or what staple he is going to make. His cotton field if picked to-day may produce good middling cotton, which is three grades above that which is admissible in the market, but a storm or other unseasonable weather may reduce that cotton below the tenderable grade before he can get into his field and pick it. Every practical cotton man knows that to be a fact. Therefore, if the planter desired to sell his actual spot cotton for future delivery, as was contemplated by the Caraway bill, as is contemplated by every other bill on the subject, he could not guarantee a single grade nor could he guarantee the staple, because the law provides that neither gin-cut, water-packed, perished-fiber, or cotton having any deterioration of the length of the staple shall be admitted.

I have known cotton which was as fine in grade as it could be and yet almost as rotten as paper. It would pass the grade, but could not pass the staple. I have also known cotton that would not pass the grade but had a staple equal to good middling cotton, both in character, which means the strength, and in length, which means the measurement of the length of the staple. If a cotton planter wanted to deliver his cotton, if he wanted to sell his cotton, he could not specify the grade or the length of staple. He could simply sell basis middling and deliver what was tenderable.

Now, I am going to discuss what is termed "the Vinson bill." I wish to state to my colleagues that in the hearings they will find it stated that a great many of the disastrous slumps in cotton come from ill-advised statements emanating from the Agricultural Department.

In September, 1927, when every bale of cotton that was going to be produced in the United States during that year had been produced, when the market had opened and cotton was being marketed, the Agricultural Department unfortunately issued a bulletin in which it was stated that cotton for the next few months was likely to decline. I hope some of the southern Senators who are here will give ear to what I am saying. There could not be another bale produced. Cotton had steadily risen from January on up to September, until on September 12 or 13 it had reached the price of 25 cents a pound, in spite of what ordinarily would have depressed that market below the cost of production, which was the presence in the warehouses in New York of 200,000 bales of cotton, the most of which was barely above the line of legal delivery.

On September 15, 1927, a bulletin was issued by the Bureau of Economics of the Agricultural Department in which it was stated that for the next few months cotton was likely to decline, and cotton steadily went down. I believe it went down something like $7.50 or $10 a bale the next day, and finally it went down from 25 cents a pound to 16 cents a pound, a difference of from $40 or $50 a bale by reason of the unfortunate issuance of a bulletin.

That same bulletin emanating from the Agricultural Department, with the official stamp of the Government on it, stated that the carry-over of American cotton, the old crop, into the new crop was something like, if I recall the figures, in the neighborhood of 800,000 bales in excess of what was subsequently actually found to be the carry-over. When in our examination we asked the officials of the Agricultural Department, "Whence did you get your figures?" the reply was that they had depended almost entirely upon a British spinning concern. The statement that cotton was likely to decline, coming from an official source, of course paralyzed the market; it threw fear into everyone who wanted to invest in cotton for a rise.

The source of their authority for that statement and also for the announcement that the carry-over was far in excess of the estimate of Mr. Hester, the cotton statistician of New Orleans, and of the Bureau of the Census, was a British cotton concern. That illustrates but one instance—there are numerous others—where unfortunate statements coming at a psychological moment in the marketing of cotton have been more disastrous and more far-reaching in their effect upon the price of cotton than has any speculation ever been, with one or two exceptions.

Another point. As the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Georgia will recall the market began to rise during our investigation, and consistently continued to rise until July, 1928, when there issued from the Agricultural Department a statement that there was a 12½ per cent increase in the acreage of the cotton crop. I am not here to say whether that was true or untrue, but I am here to say that it immediately smashed the market again. Why would it affect the market? The man investing in actual spot cotton and carrying it for profit would say, "Rather than hold what cotton I have, in the face of an enormous crop, I had better get out now," and he got out. I am not talking about the man who speculates as a matter of pure gambling; I am talking about the man who had bought spot for an investment. He would say, "Rather than carry this cotton, when there is an increase of acreage of from 10 to 12½ per cent, and when, if the normal yield per acre is maintained as it has been over an average of 10 years, there will be made from 18,000,000 to 20,000,000 bales, I will get out while the getting out is good," and he got out. It developed, however, that the production of cotton for 1928 did not exceed the average for the preceding 10 or 15 years, and either one of two things is certain: That the weather conditions throughout the entire Cotton Belt were the most disastrous ever known or there was no increase in acreage. Outside of the South Atlantic States there were no abnormal weather conditions. I believe, in Texas, Oklahoma, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama the conditions were about normal. Yet we did not produce very much in excess of 14,000,000 bales. When we are seeking remedies for the fluctuations in cotton we ought to have regard to what has been done by the pronouncements of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. President, I do not think that I would be justified in turning over, without due consideration and safeguards, the cotton markets of this country to a body of men who have an academic knowledge of economics but who have no practical knowledge of them. Some of them, to be as charitable as I may, as Paul said about the Jews, may have the zeal of God but not according to knowledge.

The Bureau of Economics that passed upon the statistics as to the carry-over and the possible trend of the market was composed of whom? It was composed of men who, upon their own statements, had never been south of Michigan, and one of them was just five years out of Russia. I do not believe one of them ever would know a cotton stalk from a jimson weed. Certainly they knew nothing about the intricacies of the market and the wide-flung world influences that affect the market.

Mr. President, I have been criticized here about my attitude with reference to this proposed legislation; but no Senator dare stand on this floor and say he believes that I have anything but the growers' interest at heart.

I know what it is to be restricted to selling to a monopoly. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the minority leader, knows that there is not a more valuable commercial commodity to-day than cottonseed. I had the Agricultural Department furnish me a chart, which showed that 58 standard commercial articles are to-day made from cottonseed alone. Mark you, as good butter as ever was made from the milk of a cow can be made from cottonseed oil. The world at large is using cottonseed lard. Wessen cooking oil is recognized the world over to be as fine a cooking fat as ever was produced. From the precipitate resulting from refining the oil and from powdering the hulls the best artificial leather of which the world knows is made.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. Cottonseeds are undoubtedly very valuable, but do the cottonseeds come under cotton exchanges? Do the speculators gamble in cottonseeds?

Mr. SMITH. No; but I am telling the Senator now that the producers do not get a return for them comparable to what they should get. If the Senator will sit down a minute and possess his soul in patience, I want to show him just what happens when the producer has not anybody between him and the man who manufactures.

When the price of food products was soaring just after the war I went down to one of the Government departments and inquired of an official there why cottonseed did not advance on a parity with food fats. "Well," he said, "that is governed entirely by the amount of cotton." I said, "Why, cotton has no more to do with the product of the seed than mutton has to do with wool. Of course, we have to have mutton to produce wool; but the use for wool and the use for mutton fall into two entirely different categories. Wool is for clothing purposes and mutton is for edible purposes."

Since there is a scarcity in hogs and a scarcity in beef and a scarcity in sheep, why do not the food values of cottonseed respond to that rather than be subject to the value of the cotton. Simply because no one was there except the man who made the oil.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WAGNER in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. Does not the price of the cottonseed product compare with the price of products made from some of the products that are shipped in here from the South—nuts and things of that kind?

Mr. SMITH. That may be as to the crude oil. I am not discussing that. I am not going to be deflected from the argument I am making.

I saw by the paper this morning that some one who had studied the matter said that, in his opinion, the time was not far distant when cotton would be planted for the seed, and cotton would be the by-product. As everyone knows, the meal is the finest possible cattle feed; the hulls that inclose the little kernels of meat are the finest filler in the world for cattle.

It is as fine fertilizer as ever went into a field. It analyzes 7½ per cent of available nitrogen—not ammonia, but nitrogen. It is also rich in potash. Here is an article out of which 58 standard commercial articles are made, and yet it fluctuates every day so disastrously that positively we sell a ton of seed to-day for what they get for a ton of meal, to say nothing of the hulls and the linters and also the oil that is taken from it. There is not a cotton grower here but that knows that when he comes to sell cottonseed he is absolutely at the mercy of those who monopolize the cottonseed-oil business.

Mr. President, this is just a mere sketch of the vast interest that is concerned in legislation along this line; and I maintain that in the interest of the men who grow cotton, and who want to receive approximately its value, we should legislate in such a manner as to reduce the evils to a minimum as far as legislation may but retain the market as nearly as we can for their benefit.

I am not going to stand here and vote to substitute the grain bill for the cotton bill. One reason why I would not do it is that the author of the bill sat right here the other day and repudiated his own act. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], if I remember correctly, gave testimony here that the grain futures act is absolutely worthless and useless. I think the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] corroborated that statement. There is some good and there has been good growing out of the present cotton futures act. I should like to amend it, if amendments are necessary, so as to retain the good that we have and supplement it with others, rather than taking a measure that gives to those who have been mentioned here—purely the Agricultural Department—the right to interfere with our business.

I want to read you one section of this bill. Of course, we could eliminate it; but we have not yet digested it sufficiently to know whether or not it will even approximate, ultimately, the bill that the Senator from Arkansas introduced here. If it were possible for us to get the farmer in a position where he could control even 60 per cent of the cotton crop, I believe that without legislation all these other market influences would fade away. He ought to be put in that position. If all of us, by any means, could get a regulation or an agreement by which the cotton growers of this country could pool their interests, get enough advance to meet their obligations, and dictate from day to day their price, we would then solve this problem; but so long as the man who purchases has the right to name the price, all that legislation can do is to keep abnormal and outrageous conditions from entering in.

It is abnormal and outrageous that the combined American citizenship that produces each year a billion dollars' worth of merchantable products that holds and for 65 years has held the balance of trade in favor of America, should have no voice in naming the price of those products. The gold that is poured in here from Europe in exchange for American raw cotton has held the balance of trade in favor of America for 65 years. It has no competitors. American cotton—what is known as American middling upland—has not a competitor in the world. I have in my office samples of practically all the cotton grown in the world, and there is none that has the characteristics of American cotton. Its uses are being multiplied every day; and now, since the world has accustomed itself to a method of marketing which from time to time needs to have eliminated certain inimical things that have entered into it, it is our duty to eliminate them just as far as we may, but not ill advisedly.

This whole situation is not in America alone. Sixty per cent of all of our cotton is sold abroad, in the Orient, in Europe. We have to have tremendous market places and unlimited capital in order to finance the movement of the cotton.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. If we do not get a vote this afternoon on the reconsideration of the vote by which this bill was defeated, I am afraid we will not get it at any time soon. Of course, everybody in the Senate knows how wonderful the Senator from South Carolina has been to the agricultural interests of this country, and how much he has them at heart. I was just wondering if we could get a vote this afternoon on this proposition. What is the Senator's opinion about it?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am in dead earnest when I say that the legislation we are to pass ought to have such consideration as not disastrously to affect the market of cotton.

Mr. HARRISON. One bill having passed the House, of course if we could pass that bill we would save time, and it would become a law; but the Senator has a bill on the subject, and it is quite similar to the bill that passed the House. There are some differences; but the Senator's bill has been reported to the Senate, and is on the calendar. If the motion to reconsider this vote prevails I am perfectly willing, as the originator of the motion to reconsider, for the Senator to offer his bill as a substitute for that bill, and then substitute the title of the bill that passed the House, so that we could get them into conference. The Senator will be one of the conferees.

Mr. SMITH. I understand, Mr. President; and so far as I am concerned, the proposition that I made to the Senate to-day was that we had better be safe than swift.

Mr. HARRISON. We would be safe if we should pass the Senator's bill.

Mr. SMITH. I hope we might so restrict it as to confine it to the amendments that are essential to the proper functioning of the exchange. I really think, so far as my bill is concerned——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMITH. Let me finish this sentence. I really think the bill that I introduced here, being the direct result of our investigation, would meet the situation better than the bill that was passed by the House.

I started a moment ago to read a paragraph from the bill that it has been agreed by some of those here to strike out, but I do not know what would be the result in conference. I will state to the Senate now that I will never vote to give the Secretary of Agriculture—I do not care who he may be—the right to do this:

> He shall likewise compile and furnish to producers and distributors, by means of regular or special reports, or by such methods as he may deem most effective, information respecting the cotton markets, together with information on supply, demand, price, and other conditions in this and other countries that affect the market.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator that that part of the bill was stricken out by the Senator who offered and had printed the amendment which I had hoped to substitute after the enacting clause.

Mr. SMITH. I understand; but that passed the House.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a minute? We do not raise very much cotton in Virginia, but I am interested in looking out for the little that is raised there.

As I understand, the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi is to reconsider the vote by which this bill was defeated, offer as a substitute for it the Senator's bill, known as the Smith bill, and then the Smith bill and the Vinson bill will go to conference to permit the conferees to work out the best solution of the question from these two bills.

Is that the Senator's proposition?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; that is the suggestion I made to the Senator from South Carolina. Then we can get a vote this afternoon. If the matter goes over to to-morrow, we are through.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am not going to pit my judgment of the seriousness of this matter, affecting those who have no voice except the representative voice of those whom they send here, against the judgment of a majority of these representatives, nor attempt, by any filibuster or artificial means, to delay a vote on the matter; but with all sincerity I do say that I am not going to cast my vote to substitute the grain-futures act for the cotton-futures act. One has proved beneficial, it may be in a minor degree, but it has been beneficial, while even those who were the authors of the grain-futures act have stood here on this floor and repudiated it. I do not believe, however, that there is a cotton man of any description, from the producer to the man who finishes the mercerized cotton silk, but who would testify that the cotton-futures act has in some degree helped the market.

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator promised to yield to me about half an hour ago.

Mr. SMITH. I beg the Senator's pardon. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I recognize, as does the Senator from Mississippi, the great service the Senator from South Carolina has rendered the cotton growers, and his deep interest in the subject and his thoroughgoing comprehension of it. I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that this whole question was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, there was quite an extensive hearing and a thorough study of the subject which we have been discussing here the last few days, and as a result of all those hearings, those investigations, and those studies, the Senator from South Carolina, as chairman of the subcommittee, reported out the bill which is known as the Smith bill, which is on the calendar.

The Senator from Mississippi says that he is perfectly willing, if the vote on the Caraway bill can be reconsidered, to offer the Smith bill, the result of the labors of the Committee on Agriculture, as a substitute for the Caraway bill. It seems to me the Senator ought not to have any objection to that. It does not seem to be in conflict with any position the Senator has taken.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from North Carolina has that slightly wrong. The Caraway bill has been voted upon, but in case the vote were reconsidered and the Smith bill were offered as a substitute for it, it would then have to go back to the House and take its status in the House.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to remind Senators that if the vote is reconsidered the bill will be before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. Of course it will be, and may be discussed further. I wanted to state that in case the vote were reconsidered the Vinson bill——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Mississippi has explained that his only purpose in moving to reconsider the vote by which the Caraway bill was defeated was in order to have the opportunity of getting a vote in the Senate upon a substitute.

Mr. HARRISON. Or to present the opportunity to the Senator from South Carolina in order that he might offer his own bill as a substitute.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina had been apprised that there was a universal cry for legislation right now, it would not have been necessary for his colleague to indicate to him the cry that comes from the field. I have heard no cry from the field. It may be that I no longer am considered a factor in trying to do for the cotton farmer what for 20 long years I have devoted my time to attempting to do; but I have heard no such cry. I do not know where this insistence comes from.

If we vote to reconsider the action on the Caraway bill, of course the whole matter will be open again; the Caraway bill will be back before us for consideration. The Vinson bill will be before us for consideration if it is offered as a substitute, and my bill will be before us for consideration if it is offered. Those of us who in good faith voted against the Caraway bill would want the same opportunity to discuss the probable effect of these other measures.

Mr. President, if the vote is reconsidered and the Senate in its wisdom thinks that either the Caraway bill or the Vinson bill or the Smith bill should be passed, it is their privilege and duty to so decide. But so long as I am intrusted with the confidence and respect of my people I can not go any further in my judgment, limited as it is, and my own sincere purpose, I thank God, as pure as it is. I will take every opportunity to try to do the best I can for the man who in the field, like myself, is dependent on cotton for the hope that he has.

CESSIONS OF CERTAIN ISLANDS OF THE SAMOAN GROUP

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 110) to provide for accepting, ratifying, and confirming the cessions of certain islands of the Samoan group to the United States, and for other purposes, which were, on page 3, line 2, after the word "hereby," to insert "authorized to be," and on page 3, lines 3 and 4, to strike out "and to be immediately available."

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

DENTAL CORPS OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2068, for the relief of certain officers of the Dental Corps of the United States Navy. It is a bill to take care of the active service of two dentists who, through an act passed in 1918, were deprived, in one case of one month of active service and in the other of five months.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provision contained in the act approved July 1, 1918 (40 Stat. L. p. 709), reading as follows, "And the time served by dental officers on active duty as acting assistant dental surgeons and assistant dental surgeons under provisions of law existing prior to the passage of this act shall be reckoned in computing the increased service pay and service for precedence and promotion of dental officers herein authorized or heretofore appointed," shall be held and considered to apply to all officers of the Dental Corps of the Navy who had previously served on active duty as assistant dental surgeons pursuant to the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L. p. 903), and who were regularly commissioned in the Dental Corps of the Navy at the time of the passage of the act of July 1, 1918: Provided, That such officers of the Dental Corps of the Navy shall be assigned running mates for promotion purposes in accordance with their precedence as so determined: And provided further, That no back pay or allowances shall accrue to any officer by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. SCHALL. The Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate has reported this bill unanimously, and the Naval Affairs Committee of the House has likewise reported a similar bill favorably.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I objected to the consideration of this bill the other day because it looked too general in its terms. Since then I have looked into it very carefully, and I see no objection to it, and I hope the bill will be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WAGNER in the chair). Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN M. MORIN,
W. FRANK JAMES,

The report was agreed to.

MORRIS FOX CHERRY

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12538) for the benefit of Morris Fox Cherry having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amendment of the Senate insert the following: "That no back pay or allowances shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

FRANK L. GREENE,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN M. MORIN,
W. FRANK JAMES,
JOHN J. MCSWAIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the House has agreed to the Senate amendments to this bill with certain small verbal changes. It is a bill for the relief of a young man named Cherry, who enlisted in the Army while under age four days before war was declared. If he had enlisted four days later, he would have been covered by general legislation.

The report was agreed to.

BATTLE FIELDS OF BRICES CROSS ROADS AND TUPELO, MISS.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8736) to provide for the inspection of the battle field of Brices Cross Roads, Miss., and the battle field of Tupelo, or Harrisburg, Miss., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

DAVID A. REED,
FRANK L. GREENE,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN M. MORIN,

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, this is a conference report on a bill providing for a commemoration of the battle fields of Tupelo and Brices Cross Roads, Miss. The House agrees to the Senate amendments. The commemoration is exactly in accordance with the report of the Battle Fields Commission.

The report was agreed to.

CONSTRUCTION AT THE MILITARY ACADEMY

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11469) to authorize appropriations for construction at the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 3, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert in lieu of the language stricken out by the Senate the following: "Provided, That the new cadet barracks heretofore authorized to be constructed shall be erected on the site of the old cadet mess hall, the street face of the said barracks to be in prolongation of the street face of the west academic building, leaving an open area on the north side of said barracks so that the said barracks can be supervised from the present south cadet guardhouse: And provided further"; and the Senate agree to the same.

DAVID A. REED,
W. H. MCMASTER,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN M. MORIN,
W. FRANK JAMES,
JOHN J. MCSWAIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, this is a conference report on the authorization bill for construction at West Point, where the conferees have agreed to the Senate amendments, with the insertion of a proviso to define the location of the new cadet barracks in such way as to lead to its construction at that point which will be cheapest and will require the least excavation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator if there is any additional expense involved on account of the change.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The change which has been made holds down the expense. In all other respects the Senate amendments have been agreed to.

The report was agreed to.

PRELIMINARY SURVEY OF MUD CREEK, KY.

Mr. SACKETT. I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. 15809) to authorize a preliminary survey of Mud Creek in Kentucky with a view to the control of its floods, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary survey to be made of Mud Creek in Kentucky from Mining City, at which point said creek empties into Green River, up to a point 25 or 30 miles in distance where a drainage project has been started by owners of the land on and near said creek, with a view to the control of its floods. Also to submit a report to Congress as to the feasibility of controlling the said flood waters by a drainage project, together with an estimate of the cost of said improvement.

Mr. BRATTON. Let me inquire of the Senator from Kentucky what the size of the appropriation is.

Mr. SACKETT. It is just for a survey, to see if they can control the floods. There are 6,000 acres of farm land involved.

Mr. KING. Is this an application for a survey which may involve ultimately the taking over by the Federal Government of some project at an enormous expense?

Mr. SACKETT. Not at all. It involves a small creek that has flooded 6,000 acres, and they want to straighten it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF THE NORTHWESTERN BANDS OF SHOSHONE INDIANS

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent to call up the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to Senate bill 710, and ask that it may be read.

There being no objection, the report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 710) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, adjudicate, and render judgment in claims which the northwestern bands of Shoshone Indians may have against the United States having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, and 4, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the words "for the benefit of any" and before the words "of said Indians" insert the words "band or bands," so as to make the amendment read: "Any payment which may have been made by the United States, including gratuities for the benefit of any band or bands of said Indians or for their support and civilization, shall not operate as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as a set-off in said suit"; and the House agree to the same.

LYNN J. FRAZIER,
THOS. D. SCHALL,
HENRY F. ASHURST,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SCOTT LEAVITT,
W. H. SPROUL,
JOHN M. EVANS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this is a conference report on a bill which I introduced and which was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs. A number of amendments were made in the House, and the conferees have agreed upon a report with respect to one item, a limitation of $25,000.

Since the agreement by the conferees, I am told there has been further discussion and consideration, and they find that the amendment would be somewhat at variance with similar bills; and I think that the conferees are willing, if the matter may go back to them, to eliminate the item, so as to conform the provisions of this bill with similar measures. I therefore move that the Senate disagree to the report, that the Senate further disagree to the House amendments, and ask a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. FRAZIER, Mr. SCHALL, and Mr. ASHURST conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE BETWEEN NEW ORLEANS AND GRETNA

Mr. BROUSSARD. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16162) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River between New Orleans and Gretna, La. The bill has passed the House and has a favorable report from the Committee on Commerce of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, between New Orleans and Gretna, La., authorized to be built by George A. Hero and Allen S. Hackett, their successors and assigns, by the act of Congress approved March 2, 1927, heretofore extended by act of Congress approved March 6, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from March 6, 1929.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 4257) to authorize the payment of certain salaries or compensation to Federal officials and employees by the treasurer of the Territory of Alaska, and it was signed by the Vice President.

SALE OF COTTON AND GRAIN IN FUTURE MARKETS

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. HARRISON's motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate refused to pass the bill (S. 1093) to prevent the sale of cotton and grain in future markets.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in answer to the question propounded to me by the Senator from Mississippi, of course, if the Senate ultimately rejects the Caraway bill, and it is determined to have or shows a disposition to have legislation upon the subject, I shall insist, if I have the opportunity—and I shall make the opportunity, if possible—upon having my bill considered, for the reason that it was the result of as patient and hard study as I ever gave any subject in the world. For 90 days I sat every day for two or three hours hearing testimony on every possible angle of the cotton marketing system in America and abroad. I heard men who had connection with every European market and every oriental market, who went into great detail as to the method of buying and selling, the forms of their acceptances, the exchange rules, and the contract system. I sat there for practically 90 days and heard complaints as to what had been done.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Evidently we can not reach a vote on my motion to-night. I ask unanimous consent that my motion may be considered privileged.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I could not consent to that.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I will ask that it be made privileged to follow the consideration of the prohibition bill in charge of the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. COUZENS. I object to that proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not my motion a privileged motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The privilege expired when the motion was entered.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FESS. In case we favorably consider the motion to reconsider the passage of the bill, will the limitation of debate which was to apply after 4 o'clock to-day apply to the measure when it comes before the Senate for further consideration?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold that the limitation of debate would apply.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the limitation on debate was to be in force as long as the bill might be before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. KING. That would not apply to discussion on the motion to reconsider, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; it would not.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I would be glad to have the Chair state his ruling again. Does the Chair hold that there would be a limitation of debate after the Senate decides, if it shall so decide, to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed? If the Senate shall decide to reconsider as moved by the Senator from Mississippi, is it the ruling of the Chair that that action would carry with it the limitation on debate? In other words, would it restore the status that existed before the reconsideration of the vote on the Caraway bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the motion to reconsider prevails, then the limitation on debate would apply.

Mr. SMITH. Then, as a matter of course, that would put us in the absurd position that we would have two practically new measures before us for consideration and for a vote, without an opportunity to enable the Senate to know just what would be the effect of either one and with Senators limited to 10 minutes' discussion on them, when the life and death of the entire cotton trade may hang upon what we do.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, at the time of the adoption of the unanimous-consent agreement these amendments, or at least one of them, had been offered. It had been printed and has been on the table for several days.

Mr. SMITH. It had not been offered.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no change in the condition that we were in at that time.

Mr. SMITH. The amendment had not been offered.

Mr. HARRISON. It had been lying on the table.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the amendment had not been offered. I gave notice in the early part of the discussion that at the proper time I would offer it, and I had it printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate, but I subsequently gave notice to all Senators interested that I would not offer it because I preferred to vote directly upon the Caraway bill.

Mr. SMITH. That, Mr. President, shows the attitude of those who are not vitally interested in the cotton-marketing question. It is a matter of vital importance to me, and therefore being in the same condition that millions of others are, it is my duty to protect them with all the power I have and to see to it that there shall not be legislation hurried and ill-advisedly passed through this body which may cause the ruin—not the ruin, but which would cause depression and great distress. I think I have a duty here, perhaps, which is unique as compared with that of any other Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. What does the Senator consider the duty of the Senate at this time? If he has his way, what would he have the Senate do?

Mr. SMITH. I suggested here this afternoon that we still have two weeks before the end of the session. The general aspects of the cotton market have been discussed. The specific evils to which I have referred, the remedies for which are incorporated in the bill to which I have referred, have not been discussed, but have been recognized by the trade, and remedies therefor have been incorporated in their rules and regulations. If it is the wisdom of the Senate that they should be enacted into law and crystallized into some legislative form, I think we ought to take the two bills, the one passed by the House, the grain futures act, where "grain" is stricken out and "cotton" written in, and the Smith bill, before the committee and work out what we believe will be the proper remedies, incorporate them in a bill, and then bring that bill back before the Senate as the ultimate judgment of those who represent the cotton interests, and ask the Senate to enact such a measure into law. That is the suggestion I have made, and I would carry that out in good faith.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, to the end that we may vote on the proposition, is not the Senator willing to have the Senate vote as to whether or not it wants to proceed the other way, and if it declines to reconsider as the Senator from Mississippi has moved, then he can take the course he suggested of having the matter referred to the committee.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from South Carolina that we want to have an executive session to-night, and I am wondering if the Senator will not yield to me to enable me to move that we proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I shall have something further to say on the matter, but I yield now to the Senator from Kansas for that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me before he offers his motion?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to offer for the RECORD a letter, which I will not ask to have read but merely to have printed in the RECORD. It is from the North Carolina Cotton Growers Cooperative Association, of Raleigh, N. C., opposing the passage of the Caraway bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

NORTH CAROLINA COTTON GROWERS COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION

Raleigh, N. C., February 13, 1929.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,

Capitol Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We received the copy of the Caraway bill, as mentioned in your letter of January 30. I discussed this with my board of directors at our meeting yesterday, and we are of the opinion that this proposed measure is entirely too drastic. Our position is that the exchanges should be regulated under proper control but should not be abolished.

There is, of course, much speculation and gambling on the exchanges, but there is also a large volume of legitimate business transacted through these exchanges that is of vital interest to the producers, merchants, middlemen, manufacturers, and bankers.

We are glad to note that you do not sympathize with the drastic provisions in this bill, and believe that it will be your good judgment to oppose its passage.

Very sincerely yours,

U. B. BLALOCK,

Secretary-Treasurer and General Manager.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What will be the status to-morrow morning of the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to reconsider?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will lie on the table.

Mr. TYSON. It lies on the table and will have to be called up?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will have to be called up either by motion or by unanimous consent.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 15, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, February 14, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Father, Thou hast smitten through and through with divine longings and made us children of time and eternity. Lift us up, dear Lord, to the spiritual tree of life, which is ever bending above us in heavenly abundance. Here we shall find answer to our yearnings as our souls strike their golden notes of triumph. Oh, blessed is the man who is able to say in the doorway of each morning, "Not my will, but Thine be done." In this humble submission, pardon, grace, and tranquillity are born. Thus, sublime our lives may become in wisdom, unselfishness, and sacrifice, bidding us to greatly live. May they be a perfect inspiration, counting as positive forces on the side of all goodness, and then how wonderful their steady streams of influence shall be. Do Thou let this prayer be verified in Thee. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13825) entitled "An act to authorize appropriations for construction at military posts, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, Mr. GREENE, and Mr. FLETCHER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3936) entitled "An act to regulate the practice of the healing art to protect the public health in the District of Columbia," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. CAPPER, Mr. VANDENBERG, and Mr. COPELAND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 182) entitled "Joint resolution for the relief of farmers in the storm and flood stricken areas of southeastern United States."

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. WATSON and Mr. SMITH members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Federal Radio Commission.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. COUZENS and Mr. COPELAND members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of Labor.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 328

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. Frank P. Flint, formerly a Senator from the State of California.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

HON. CHARLES R. SKINNER

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a unanimous-consent request. The Hon. Charles R. Skinner, a former Representative in this House from the State of New York, died at his home in Pierrepont Manor, on July 1, 1928. Mr. Skinner had a long and distinguished career after leaving this House.

I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] may extend his remarks in the RECORD with reference to the life and work of Mr. Skinner.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, Charles Rufus Skinner was born at Union Square, Oswego County, N. Y., August 4, 1844, son of Avery and Charlotte Prior (Stebbins) Skinner, and a descendant of worthy New England ancestry. Avery Skinner was a native of New Hampshire, a farmer by occupation, settled in Watertown, N. Y., in 1816, from whence he removed to Oswego County, N. Y., in 1826. He was postmaster at Union Square, which place he settled and named, for 50 years, having been appointed by President John Quincy Adams.

Charles Rufus Skinner was brought up on his father's farm, attended the district school in his native town until his sixteenth year, after which he accepted the position of teacher in a neighboring school, assisted in the work of the post office at Watertown, N. Y., and in various other ways obtained sufficient capital to enable him to pursue his education further. He became a student in the Clinton Liberal Institute, and later in the Mexico Academy, New York, from which he was graduated in 1866, the valedictorian of his class, and during the following year he acted as teacher in the same institution. In December, 1867, he went to New York City and took charge of the agency of the Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Co., but remained only three years, his father being in such ill health that he was obliged to return home to manage the farm. In 1870 he became a resident of Watertown, N. Y., and until 1874 was part owner, business manager, and city editor of the Watertown Daily Times and Reformer. He was a member of the board of education of Watertown from 1875 to 1884; member of the New York Assembly from 1876 to 1881 from Jefferson County, during which time he served as chairman of the committees on public printing and railroads, and as member of the committees on cities, insurance, internal affairs, and so forth. In 1877 he introduced and pushed to its passage the bill prohibiting frequent changes in textbooks in schools, and in 1879 introduced a bill to reduce legislative expenses, and an amendment to the constitution to bring about biennial sessions of the legislature. This resolution passed one legislature, but in the following year was defeated in the senate. This proposition was favored by Governor Cornell in his message of 1882, and urged by Governor Black in 1898. In 1879–80 Mr. Skinner was active in advocating the antidiscrimination freight bill, and the measure for 5-cent fares on the New York elevated railroads. In 1878 he served on a special committee of the assembly to consider and report on the State normal schools.

He was a Member of the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, 1881–1885, representing Jefferson, Lewis, and Herkimer Counties, where he was instrumental in securing the reduction of letter postage from 3 to 2 cents, and was the author of the bill providing for the special-delivery system and the passage of the law giving letter carriers a vacation. He opposed the Chinese restrictive act, urging in a powerful speech that the United States was bound to keep the terms of the treaty made with China; made speeches in favor of prompt action to suppress polygamy, and against the Morrison tariff bill in 1883, and was active in all debates on post-office questions. In 1884 he was appointed to the Board of Visitors at West Point with General Rosecrans, Colonel Waring, and others. In 1885, after his term in Congress expired, he edited the Watertown Daily Republican and served in that capacity until January, 1886, and then for a short time was city editor of the Watertown Daily Times. He was deputy State superintendent of public instruction from 1886 to 1892; supervisor of teachers' institutes and training classes from 1892 to 1895; State superintendent of public instruction from April 7, 1895, to 1904, and was elected president of the National Educational Association at its meeting in Buffalo in 1896. Doctor Skinner's administration as superintendent of public instruction revealed a marked enthusiasm in the cause of popular education; a sincere devotion to its interest and forceful methods of promoting them. He was zealous in upholding the integrity of his department against all assaults upon it, and consistently advocated the placing of all tax-supported schools within its control.

A few of the significant events of his tenure were the proposal of an educational qualification for school commissioners (not perfected); the fixing of the statutory school age at from 5 to 18 years; the observance, in 1895, of the centennial of the law establishing common schools; the act of 1895 requiring the display of the Stars and Stripes upon the schoolhouses of the State; the commemoration of the one hundredth birthday, May 14, 1895, of the great educator, Horace Mann; the judicial decision of the Watervliet case, affirming the power of the State to compel a municipality, or school district, to provide and maintain adequate educational facilities; the satisfactory execution of the compulsory education law, enacted in 1894; and the enlargement of the number of State scholarships in Cornell University from 128 to 150, to conform to the apportionment of assembly districts under the constitution of 1894. While State superintendent, Doctor Skinner, made educational visits and addresses in every county of the State, and in many neighboring States. He served as assistant appraiser of the port of New York from 1906 to 1911; was librarian of the New York Assembly 1913 and 1914; and from 1915 to 1925 was legislative librarian in charge of a library formed by the consolidation of the senate and assembly libraries.

Doctor Skinner was a life member of the New York State Press Association, and had frequently been delegated to represent it in the meetings of the National Editorial Association. He was a member of the Fort Orange Club of Albany, the Republican Club of New York City, the Union League of Brooklyn, and the Thousand Island Club of Alexandria Bay. He was a trustee of St. Lawrence University and of the Albany Home School for the Deaf. He received the degrees—master of arts from Hamilton College, 1889; doctor of laws from Colgate University, 1895; doctor of literature from Tufts College, 1901. He was the author of Commercial Advantages of Watertown, N. Y. (1876); New York Question Book (1890); Arbor Day Manual (1891); Manual of Patriotism for the Schools of New York (1900); and The Bright Side (1909).

Doctor Skinner married, October 16, 1873, at Watertown, N. Y., Elizabeth Baldwin, daughter of David W. and Laura (Merriman) Baldwin, of Watertown. Mrs. Skinner died March 8, 1918.

He died July 1, 1928, at the home of his son, Charles R. Skinner, jr., at Pelham Manor, in his eighty-fourth year, and left him surviving three sons and one daughter, Harold Baldwin, Albert Merriman, Charles Rufus, jr., and Elizabeth Skinner Palmer.

Doctor Skinner was very fond of history; loved everything that was beautiful and good. For years he saved clippings that contained sentiments of the good, beautiful, and substantial things of life, and finally arranged them and had them printed in book form called The Bright Side. He took many trips and always wrote very interesting accounts of the same, which were published in the papers and magazines. Doctor Skinner was very fond of his home life and his family and often said one of the sorrows of his life was that his official duties separated him so much of his time from his home.

Doctor Skinner was intensely loyal to his country, and his book, Manual of Patriotism, and the display of the American flag on or near the public schools evidenced that fact, and he desired that the school children should have the same feeling for their country that he had.

His life was one of great usefulness and he made constructive and substantial contributions to his community, the State, and the Nation during his long and active career.

Hawes, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

R. 5491) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1921, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand this is also called up by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a statement on the judicial procedure of European countries, by Judge Edward J. Henning, of the southern district of New York.

This is a statement made to the Attorney General of the United States and was sent by the Attorney General to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House. It is a very illuminating statement upon the judicial procedure of foreign countries. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD, and I hope every Member will take the time to read it.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that statement has already been inserted in the RECORD in the Senate.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I did not know that. If it has been printed in the RECORD, I will not press the matter any further.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17053) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes; and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate to-day be equally divided between the gentleman from Louisiana and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17053; and pending that, asks unanimous consent that general debate to-day be equally divided between himself and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN]. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and, of course, I shall not object, I understand this means that such time as is used in general debate to-day will be controlled equally by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WELSH] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN]?

Mr. HASTINGS. May I inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether the time used in debate is even up to date? Is the time even on both sides?

Mr. SANDLIN. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Louisiana will look after that and see that this side of the House gets such time as it is entitled to.

Mr. HASTINGS. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Louisiana. I know the gentleman from Louisiana will see to it that this side gets its share of the time, but I was a little afraid that the unanimous-consent request would not take into consideration the time used heretofore, and it would be beyond the power of the gentleman from Louisiana to equalize it.

Mr. SANDLIN. I will say to the gentleman that his fears are not well founded. I have had the matter up with the gentleman from Pennsylvania and can assure the gentleman that this side will have its share of the time.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am quite well satisfied that the gentleman from Louisiana will take care of his friends in this debate; but what is to happen to a poor fellow who stands in the attitude of declining to beg time from any Member of the House other than the Speaker? That is my situation; and here I stand, day after day, exercising that almost sublime charity which is mine, and not objecting to unanimous-consent requests for a proceeding which I regard as wicked.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. This is not the time when I want to speak. [Laughter.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say it is not at all necessary for the gentleman from Nebraska to beg time either from this side or the other side of the House. Either one of us would be delighted to offer him time without even a request if we knew when he wanted it.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. That is very sweet of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WELSH]?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17053, the legislative appropriation bill, with Mr. SNELL in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND].

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when the Banking and Currency Committee of the House had up for consideration the bill of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG], Governor Strong, of the Federal Reserve Board Bank in New York, was a witness. This was over a year ago. During the time he was giving his testimony I prepared a few questions that I intended to propound to him. Before having a fair chance to do so he announced that he had an appointment to fill and asked to be excused. He left the committee before the hearings on Mr. STRONG's bill were over and I was thus prevented from submitting the same to him. Subsequently he died, and therefore I lost the opportunity of doing so. The whole country, particularly at this time, is more or less interested in the issue referred to in my interrogatories and therefore I want to read the same before I proceed with my address. The questions are as follows:

(a) Give me the names of the New York banks who discount obligations with the New York Federal Reserve Bank for the purpose of obtaining money to be used for speculative purposes on the major commodities produced by the farmers, such as cotton, corn, wheat, swine, and cattle.

(b) If the New York banks borrow money for such purposes state, if within your knowledge, how often and how much per month during the season of harvesting and marketing such commodities.

(c) At what rate or rates of interest are the loans for such purposes made?

(d) What information do you have or can furnish the committee in regard to other banks borrowing money for such purposes in the Chicago and New Orleans Federal land bank districts?

Answers to these questions may be confined to the last three years, beginning January 1, 1925, including the years 1925, 1926, and 1927.

(e) Why the New York Federal Reserve Bank, the greatest one of the Federal reserve system, did not pay into the Treasury of the United States, during the year 1927, any franchise tax?

(f) Whether or not it is a fact, by the adoption of a certain policy and the skillful manipulation of figures, or otherwise, notwithstanding the banks may make sufficient earnings to require the payment of a franchise tax, it can be made to appear by the powers conferred upon the Federal reserve banks that the earnings were insufficient to authorize such payment.

(g) How many times, and when, during the last 12 months has the rate of interest or the discount rate been changed, and state the reason or purpose the officers of the bank had in mind in making the change.

(h) What effect on the money market and on business, especially on the stock exchanges, when you decrease the rate of discount from 4½ to 4 and when you increase the rate from 4 to 4½?

(i) Who or what class of persons or interests, if any, were benefited by such increases and decreases?

As stated, this was a year ago. Subsequent to the warning given to the New York banks by the Federal board on February 2 of this year, and only thereafter after I introduced a resolution (H. J. Res. 414) to authorize an investigation of the loans made by certain Federal reserve banks, and for other purposes. That joint resolution is as follows:

That after March 4, 1929, those members of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives of the Seventieth Congress who are Members elect to the Seventy-first Congress, or a majority of them, until the meeting of the first regular session of the Seventy-first Congress, are authorized, by subcommittee or otherwise, to investigate—

(1) The amount, rates of interest, and rates of discount of loans made by the Federal reserve banks of New York, Chicago, and New Orleans since January 1, 1925, to brokers and other persons for the purpose of speculating on cotton, tobacco, corn, wheat, swine, or cattle;

(2) The amount, rates of interest, and rates of discount of loans made by the Federal reserve banks of New York, Chicago, and New Orleans since January 1, 1925, to brokers and other persons for the purpose of speculation, and the effect on the amount, rates of interest, and rates of discount on loans for the purpose of producing, harvesting, and marketing cotton, tobacco, corn, wheat, swine, or cattle;

(3) The fluctuations in discount rates of the several Federal reserve banks since January 1, 1925, the reasons for such fluctuations, and the effect of such fluctuations on the price of cotton, tobacco, corn, wheat, swine, and cattle;

(4) The activity of the Federal Reserve Board since January 1, 1925, with a view to determining whether, and in what instances, the policies of such board have had the effect of decreasing the prices of any commodities; and

(5) The amount of Federal taxes paid by the several Federal reserve banks since January 1, 1925, and the reasons for the differences in the yearly amounts paid.

SEC. 2. Such members of such committee are authorized to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such stenographic services to report its hearings, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures (including expenditures for travel) as they deem necessary. Such expenses shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, on vouchers authorized by such members, signed by the person acting as chairman, and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, in line with the resolution, other figures could not be obtained—for instance, from savings banks that I have particularly in mind in the State of New York, where large sums were withdrawn for investment in Florida and other portions of the United States during the land boom, and whether any accurate figures can be obtained from those banks and the whole picture developed of the savings of the country that go into all the different fields of speculation?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Let me say that I read the speech in the RECORD of the gentleman from New York on this subject last night, and I agree with him fully that the investigation ought to embrace all these operations that he has suggested. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARKE. I thank the distinguished son of Georgia.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I am a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, and I have given a good deal of study to this question, and therefore I want to outline a few phases only as to the rights and powers of the Federal Reserve Board.

The questions, among others, which are involved in the resolution (H. J. Res. 414) which I introduced on February 11, may be stated as follows:

What authority of law or what provision of the act establishing the Federal reserve system grants to the Federal Reserve Board the power to adopt a policy similar to the deflation policy of 1920 or the policy involved in the warning which the board on February 2, 1929, promulgated in regard to making excessive loans and maintaining speculative security loans with the aid of Federal reserve credit? I take it that the board in its judgment has the authority to promulgate such policies. I do not question the good faith of the personnel of the board, particularly in regard to the warning of February 2, 1929, and yet I do not believe that the Federal reserve act, legally construed, gives to the board such authority.

In other words, I contend that it was never contemplated by President Wilson when he brought this matter to the attention of Congress that such authority should be conferred upon the Federal Reserve Board. Neither do I believe that it was in the legislative mind, when Congress passed the Federal reserve act, that it was conferring upon the Federal Reserve Board the right to adopt a policy similar to the deflation policy of 1920. I do not believe for an instant that it was ever in the mind of President Wilson or Congress, when this legislation was being considered and was passed by Congress, that authority was being vested in the Federal Reserve Board or power was being granted to the Federal Reserve Board to use the machinery of the act in order to decrease or increase the prices of cotton, tobacco, corn, wheat, swine, cattle, or any other farm commodity. [Applause.] Neither do I understand under what provision of the Federal reserve act the board proclaimed its February 2, 1929, warning, though there may have been ample and sufficient reasons existing for either a voluntary or involuntary cessation of such unprecedented speculation as has been going on in New York for several months, to which the New York banks as well as the Federal Reserve Bank of New York were parties.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. With reference to the board undertaking to prevent its rediscounts being used for speculative purposes, the gentleman realizes that the purpose of the Federal reserve act was to mobilize the reserves of the member banks.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Exactly.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. And not for speculative purposes, but for certain purposes defined in the act, to wit, business, agriculture, and industry. Is it not the duty of the board to use all of its powers to prevent its rediscounts being used for speculative purposes instead of for the purposes contemplated by the Federal reserve act?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I answer the gentleman in the affirmative. What I mean to say is this: The Federal reserve act had for its purpose, among other things—the mobilizing of the reserves arising from the deposits made in the member banks throughout the entire Union. The object of mobilizing these reserves was to furnish a basis of credit to be used in taking care of the commercial, industrial, and agricultural conditions in each of the Federal reserve districts.

And when it departs from this fundamental and basic principle it is a usurpation of authority, in my judgment.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. In connection with the inquiry submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] I think I possibly interpret what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND] has in mind a little better than has been stated. I do not understand that the gentleman from Georgia objects to the Federal Reserve Board using its powers to promote and carry forward the purposes of the Federal reserve act, and afford credits for agriculture, industry, and commerce; but that the gentleman questions the policy of the Federal Reserve Board in what it has had to say in statements issued to the country similar to the statements issued back in 1920 and also in 1929.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. STEAGALL. Although they may be made now for a different purpose, and they operate in a different way.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I am going to discuss that phase of the question.

First I want to state that loans on security collateral to members of the New York Stock Exchange on January 31, 1929, totaled $6,735,164,241. The increase over the previous month was $295,423,730.

New York institutions loaned $5,043,292,321 on demand and $620,499,847 on time, advancing the former by $233,778,811 and the latter by $29,215,448.

Demand loans totaled $5,982,672,410. This is the greatest gain or increase noted for New York banking institutions, and unprecedented in the history of the Nation in regard to the volume of credit and loans for speculative purposes.

I think my contention in respect of this matter is true, for the manifest reason that it never did occur to President Wilson or to Congress that the Federal reserve banks would ever make such excessive loans to persons for purely speculative purposes.

If this act confers such authority upon the Federal Reserve Board, speaking for myself alone, I think this authority ought to be revoked or modified, and in lieu thereof I think it is the duty of Congress to define the powers of the Federal Reserve Board so that the business world, as well as the 12 Federal reserve banks and all banks members of the Federal reserve system, may know how far and to what extent the Federal Reserve Board may act in reference to promulgating such policies. [Applause.]

If the board has authority under any provision of the Federal reserve act to adopt such policies as was adopted in 1920, or to adopt a policy the effect of which would be to decrease or increase the prices of the farmers' commodities, I think it is the solemn duty of Congress to enact legislation sufficient to eliminate such authority. [Applause.]

In this connection I frankly concede that it is essentially important that the Federal Reserve Board be fully authorized to adopt such rules and regulations which will enable the board, if and when necessary, to prohibit the Federal reserve banks from making excessive and exorbitant loans for purely speculative purposes. In other words, authority should be given the board, to be used in a wise and conservative manner, to prohibit member banks of the Federal reserve system from making such loans for purely speculative purposes. In short, Congress should give the board authority to take such effective steps as may be necessary to curtail loans for speculation or to prevent an excessive amount of the country's credit being absorbed in speculative purposes. However, this authority should be clearly defined so that all persons interested may know the extent of the board's rights and duty.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. Does the gentleman not think, under the construction the Federal Reserve Board have arrogated to themselves of the Federal reserve act, that there is no single body set up by the Congress of the United States that has the power for making not alone millions but billions of dollars that this Federal Reserve Board has?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I think the board, according to its construction of the Federal bank act and the manner in which they have exercised it, has more authority and power than any other seven men of any government on the face of the earth. [Applause.] So much power is dangerous and a menace to the people of this Republic.

In addition to this, I think it is the duty of the Federal Reserve Board or the 12 Federal reserve banks themselves to advise Congress and in this way inform the public why there was no payment of any franchise tax on the part of several of the big banks of the Federal reserve system for the years which the record shows none has been paid, and why so little has been paid during these years by these banks which have made payments.

The total gross earnings, expenses, and net earnings of the 12 banks of the Federal reserve system from 1914 to 1926 are as follows:

From 1914 to 1926

Gross earnings for Federal reserve system	$678,999,660
Total expenses for Federal reserve system	257,144,956
Net earnings for Federal reserve system	421,854,704
Gross earnings for Federal reserve, Atlanta	31,712,460
Total expenses for Federal reserve, Atlanta	12,526,915
Net earnings for Federal reserve, Atlanta	19,185,545
Gross earnings for Federal reserve, Boston	46,012,482
Total expenses for Federal reserve, Boston	17,291,663

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman state the percentage of profit there, if he has it?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I have not those statistics, but it shows that from 1914 until the end of 1927 these 12 banks made $446,691,220 net, outside of the enormous expense of $322,928,445 incurred in the administration of the banks.

The gross earnings of these banks from organization down to the end of 1927 was $769,619,665. The expenses were $322,928,445, leaving net earnings of $446,691,220.

The franchise tax paid by the 12 Federal reserve banks into the Treasury of the United States from 1914 to 1925, inclusive, was $139,173,943.

These 12 banks for the year 1926 only paid $818,150.

For the year 1927 they paid the insignificant sum of $249,591, though in 1928 they paid $2,584,659.

The total franchise tax paid by these banks from 1914 to January 1, 1929, amounts to $142,826,343.

I especially call your attention to the fact that for the year 1926 the Boston bank paid only $45,962, the Richmond bank paid $84,472, the Minneapolis bank paid $234,381, and the Kansas City bank paid $453,335.

I also specially direct your attention to the fact that for the year 1926 the following banks did not pay a dollar franchise tax:

New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Atlanta, Chicago, St. Louis, Dallas, and San Francisco.

For the year 1927 only 2 banks of the entire 12 banks of the system paid any franchise tax. They were Minneapolis and Kansas City.

FOR THE NEW YEAR 1928

The Richmond bank paid franchise tax of $673,449.
The Atlanta bank paid franchise tax of $823,301.
The St. Louis bank paid franchise tax of $40,293.
The Minneapolis bank paid franchise tax of $390,151.
The Kansas City bank paid franchise tax of $365,855.
The Dallas bank paid franchise tax of $291,610.

While the banks at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Chicago, and San Francisco did not pay a cent of franchise tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman tell us when the Federal Reserve Bank of New York last raised its rediscount rate?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. In my resolution I ask for that information, and likewise information in regard to other times and years the rediscount rate was increased and decreased.

Mr. WINGO. It is public knowledge. It was last July. They have not raised the rate since then.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. That was the last time they raised it?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; last July. Is it not a fact that the Federal reserve banks have been following the market rate and not forcing the market rate? Is not the Federal reserve discount rate now from 1 to 1½ per cent below the current commercial rate?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I want to know why and when they increase the rate from 4 to 4½ per cent and when only the board decreased it from 4½ to 4, or from 5 to 5½, and from 5½ to 5. What is the object in view? Whom are they serving? Not the agricultural classes. What persons—banks or classes of people—gain by decreasing and increasing the discount rate?

Mr. WINGO. Is the gentleman criticizing them because the other day they admonished the banks to observe the law and not let funds out for speculative purposes but to save it for agricultural purposes?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. They did not ask that it be saved for agricultural purposes.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. No; they did not. I am not now criticizing the board for that but am deliberately calling attention to the failure to include the country's agricultural interests. I agree they ought to have authority to admonish the banks to obey the law in a wise, conservative way, but before they do so Congress ought to define their rights and powers and let the country know what their rights and powers are before they do it again, so that everybody may have full knowledge of the board's authority and its limitations.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman ought to know——

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Well——

Mr. WINGO. That our Committee on Banking and Currency held these hearings over the last 12 months and we had before us Governor Strong, of the Federal Reserve Board, and every member of the Federal Reserve Board, and what was simply repeated the other day was stated publicly three times. What now have they done that has not been proclaimed from the housetops?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Why has not the board stopped this wild and reckless use of the credit facilities of the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. WINGO. You will recall I warned them a year ago that they could not stop outside funds not belonging to New York banks from flowing into brokers' loans even if they stopped the New York banks. The truth is that hundreds of country banks are more sinners than New York banks. These country banks have twice as much funds loaned on call in the stock market as have the New York banks.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I do not agree with you in that statement at all. I know that the agricultural classes and interests in the South and West have not been considered——

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman know of one single bank in an agricultural district that has been denied an eligible rediscount in the last 12 months?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. When you ask a question you ought to give me time to answer it before you propound another. According to reports among business circles from Macon in my

State, the Macon Bank, Macon, Ga., which failed with over $9,000,000 on deposit, was not accorded this privilege.

Mr. WINGO. And did not have eligible paper?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. The bank had thousands of dollars of eligible paper. And a great many people claim that if the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta had gone to their assistance at the proper time they would not have failed. Within 60 days after the Macon Bank failed the receiver, appointed by Mr. Pole, and the Comptroller of the Currency have sold thousands and thousands of dollars' worth of the bank's negotiable assets at 100 cents on the dollar.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. They sold three and a half million.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I did not know the exact amount. My friend Mr. RUTHERFORD, who represents the county of Bibb, in which Macon is located, verifies my statement. Let me further answer the question of the gentleman from Arkansas, who is as well posted on this subject as any Member of the House and who is the ranking member of the minority of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

This warning of February 2, 1929, omits entirely any claim or reference to the agricultural interests of the country. The gentleman who wrote that did not have the agricultural interests in mind or, it seems to me, he would not have omitted the country's agricultural need for credit.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman answer this question?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes; if I can. The gentleman knows he is an expert——

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman know——

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. At cross-questioning.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman know a single country bank in his district that changes its rate daily based upon the rediscount rate of New York? My bank in my home town, when I go to it, charges 10 per cent in advance regardless of the New York rate.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. We are not guilty of charging usury in my State so far as my personal knowledge goes. The offense of charging usury is odious to the law and has been for centuries.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand the gentleman——

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. The gentleman from Arkansas has already taken up a good deal of my time.

Mr. WINGO. I understand the gentleman was criticizing the board because they were trying to check this speculation, and in the next breath he says he wants them to do something. What does the gentleman want them to do?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I have not the time to repeat what I have said upon this subject. If I repeated it, it would not make it any clearer in the gentleman's mind. Besides, I always thought that the Federal reserve act was created not only to prevent panics, among other things, but also to aid struggling banks and, if possible, to keep them going. [Applause.]

On April 10, 1925, I was on a trip to Florida. I stopped at the Federal reserve bank in Atlanta and I asked one of its officers, "What do you think of the condition and what are you going to do for the Georgia National Bank?" His reply was, "We will let the bank have a million dollars if necessary." After two days' stay in Florida I had an attack of asthma and returned to Atlanta and entered the Piedmont Hospital. Four days thereafter, on April 14, my two sons-in-law came to my room and broke the news to me that the Georgia National Bank had failed.

Mr. WINGO. Is that your answer to my question, What do you want the board to do about the call loans in New York?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield the gentleman 5 minutes additional time.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. My position in regard to this matter, as heretofore explained, may not suit the gentleman, but I insist that my resolution and the remarks I have made up to date on this question plainly show what I think ought to be done.

Pursuing the fate of the Georgia National Bank a little further, I may say, as I have been reliably informed, that Governor Wellborn, of the Atlanta Bank, wanted to extend further credit to the Georgia National Bank and to do for it whatever was necessary to prevent a failure of the bank, he being of the opinion that its financial condition authorized it, and that one member of the Federal Reserve Board here in Washington kept him from making effective his purpose. For this reason the bank failed, and as a result men and women, widows and orphans, of all classes of our people, and of both races, lost the earnings of a lifetime. When the Georgia National Bank failed the American State Bank closed its doors, and a branch of this latter bank on Broad Street likewise closed its doors. In addition to this, several other banks who had been doing business with the Georgia National Bank went on the rocks.

I have always felt, and feel yet, that the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta could have safely come to the rescue of the Georgia National Bank and saved it from insolvency. In my judgment, failure to do so was a misconception of the rights of member banks of the Federal reserve system, and if a member of the Federal Reserve Board, as I am informed, who did not know as much about the Georgia National Bank as Governor Wellborn did, disapproved of his recommendation, and by his protest caused the Georgia National Bank to fail, it was an abuse of authority of the Federal Reserve Board. It is as much the board's duty to prevent the failure of banks, where it is reasonably safe to do so, as it is to issue such a warning as was promulgated on February 2, 1929. However, I concede that authority ought to be vested in the Federal Reserve Board by Congress, fully and clearly defined, to take such action as it may deem necessary to put an end to such speculations as have been going on for some time in New York.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. In reading the gentleman's inquiry I find that it was to apply only to New Orleans, New York, and Chicago. Should not the gentleman's resolution provide for the entire system and not certain banks? If we go into this matter suggested by the gentleman, it would be well to cover the whole field and get the whole picture.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I agree with the gentleman; but in my resolution I was dealing with speculation in farm commodities and stocks and bonds particularly, and therefore only named New Orleans, New York, and Chicago.

Mr. STEAGALL. My resolution provides for a much wider range of inquiry.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I hope when it gets before our committee the gentleman will amend it and cover all the other nine banks, if the resolution is not sufficient to authorize this.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WELLER. Does the gentleman hope to stop all kinds of speculation, as well as gambling in stocks?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. The speculation I am particularly concerned in and want to inquire into is gambling speculation. Gambling denounced by law as such should be stopped by the Federal Reserve Board. Gambling in the meaning of the law called speculation by the speculators, on farm commodities is vicious. Speculation in good faith—that is, buying and selling—with the purpose of delivery is legitimate, whether in stocks and bonds or farm products. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for one minute.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, during my entire service in Congress I have made every possible effort to wind up the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma. The last report of the Secretary of the Interior shows that with the exception of a number of suits brought under jurisdictional acts passed by Congress in 1924 the affairs of all of these tribes, with the exception of the sale of the coal and asphalt deposits belonging to the Choctaws and Chickasaws, have been wound up.

I have cooperated in every possible way with the Members of the Oklahoma delegation in Congress and the Department of the Interior in an effort to have these coal and asphalt deposits sold.

We enacted legislation several years ago authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell these deposits, subject to certain limitations and restrictions named in the act. Many years ago these deposits were appraised. They have been offered at public sale five times. Only a comparatively small amount of the deposits have been sold.

On January 15, 1929, I pressed the matter of the winding up of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes and particularly the sale of the coal and asphalt deposits of the Choctaws and Chickasaws upon the attention of the Secretary of the Interior in a letter reviewing what had been done and urging upon the department the importance and advisability of completely winding up the affairs of these tribes and the disposition of these coal and asphalt deposits. I asked to be informed in what way I could cooperate and be of assistance in this, as the following letter indicates:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1929.

Hon. ROY O. WEST,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am greatly interested in cooperating in every possible way to assist in winding up the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma.

Agreements were entered into between the representatives of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations and the commissioners representing the United States on the 23d day of April, 1897, between the representative of the Creek Nation and the commissioners representing the United States on the 27th day of September, 1897, which agreements were approved by Congress on June 28, 1898. An agreement was made with the representatives of the Seminole Nation on the 16th day of December, 1897, which was approved by Congress on July 1, 1898, and an act was passed by Congress July 1, 1902, submitting to the Cherokee people for ratification, an agreement which was approved by the Cherokee people at an election held on August 7, 1902.

All of these agreements and acts of Congress, supplemental treaties, and amendatory acts of Congress, provided for the making of the tribal rolls, the allotment of the tribal lands in severalty, and the disposition of their money, among the enrolled members of the tribes found entitled thereto.

Your attention is invited to the first paragraph on page 69 of the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1928, entitled "Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma," which reads in part as follows:

"The remaining tribal property (including amounts uncollected from sales of tribal land and minerals) of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations is valued at $10,444,104. The amounts to be collected from Choctaw and Chickasaw tribal property heretofore sold aggregate $944,754. The present tribal property of the Creek Nation is valued at $92,050, and that of the Seminole Nation at $30,000. The amounts to be collected on Creek tribal property heretofore sold aggregate $27,334. A few small tracts of land belonging to the Cherokee Nation are yet to be disposed of and the sum of $153 remains to be collected on Cherokee tribal property heretofore sold, otherwise the Cherokee tribal affairs, except pending litigation in the United States Court of Claims, are practically closed."

I would appreciate it if you would furnish me with data showing the various items referred to in the above-estimated values of tribal property undisposed of belonging to the respective tribes. Congress has enacted legislation which would enable the department to completely wind up all of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes. If any additional legislation is necessary, I will be glad to cooperate with the other members of the Oklahoma delegation and the department in securing its enactment.

I think that the members of these tribes, and particularly the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes, have a right to complain against the delay in the winding up of their affairs. They were the first to make agreements with the commissioners representing the United States in 1897, and this first agreement was ratified by Congress on June 28, 1898, more than 30 years ago. The rolls were completed and closed on or before March 4, 1907, almost 22 years ago. The lands were allotted to the members of these two tribes, and the other members of the other Five Civilized Tribes, and these allotments were completed some 20 years ago. The tribal property referred to as belonging to the Choctaws and Chickasaws in the report above referred to, valued at $10,444,104, largely consists of coal and asphalt deposits. Legislation has been enacted from time to time looking to the sale of these coal and asphalt deposits.

I am aware of the fact that these deposits have been offered for sale and that bids have not been received on a large part of these deposits submitting offers which the department felt justified in accepting. These deposits were appraised a number of years ago. Since that time oil and gas have been discovered in great areas and used as a fuel substitute for coal. Coal has also been discovered in large areas in public and private lands in many of the Western States, and these discoveries, and financial difficulties, and other reasons assigned by the department from time to time, are urged as excuses for not winding up the affairs of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes.

Under the jurisdictional acts passed in 1924 all of the Five Civilized Tribes have been authorized to institute suits in the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, on all claims which they may have against the Government of the United States. Many of these suits have already been instituted, and it is the hope of the attorneys representing the tribes that they may be brought to trial and finally disposed of within the next two years. In the meantime the remaining tribal property, including the mineral deposits, belonging to the Choctaws and the Chickasaws should be disposed of.

I wanted to inquire what, if any, effort is being made looking to the disposition of this remaining tribal property and whether anything was done by the department during the past year looking to the disposition of this property? I favor the disposition of the remaining undisposed of tribal property to the very best possible advantage to the tribes, and I have particular reference to the coal and asphalt deposits. I favor this property being advertised as extensively as possible, using the experience of those familiar with the method of advertising public property for sale, and these deposits offered and sold at a time and under circumstances during the calendar year of 1929, which will insure the bringing of the greatest possible amount to the tribes.

If any additional legislation is necessary to effect this sale, I want to be advised and will be glad to actively cooperate with the department and the other members of the Oklahoma delegation to secure its enactment. I do not believe we are justified in further withholding from sale these mineral deposits because the Government has not received an offer approximating the appraised value, made years ago, before the discovery of large quantities of oil and gas and coal throughout the various Western States.

There were 20,799 enrolled members of the Choctaw Tribe and 6,304 enrolled members of the Chickasaw Tribe. The rolls were completed and closed as of date of March 4, 1907. It is estimated that one-third of the original enrolled members of these tribes have since died. The determination of their heirs is an ever-increasing question. In my judgment, the affairs of all of these tribes, except the suits pending and authorized to be instituted under the jurisdictional acts of 1924, should be wound up during the next fiscal year ending on or before June 30, 1930. I want to inquire particularly what, if any, efforts are being made for the sale of the remaining coal and asphalt deposits belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes, and whether or not the department has in contemplation the sale of these deposits in the near future, and also what, if anything, it is necessary for Congress to do to aid the department in the sale of these deposits, or in any other manner to assist the department in the winding up of the affairs of these tribes.

Very respectfully,

W. W. HASTINGS.

On January 25, 1929, I received a reply from the Secretary of the Interior reviewing the entire matter and inclosing a copy of a draft of a bill suggesting legislation which the department thought would help expedite the sale of these coal and asphalt deposits. The letter reviews the record of what has been done by the department in this matter, and is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 25, 1929.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Reference is made herein to your letter of January 15, 1929, in which you inquire as to the remaining tribal property of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma and as to what steps are being taken looking to the disposal thereof and the winding up of the tribal affairs.

For your information as to the undisposed-of tribal lands and other property of the Five Civilized Tribes, there are transmitted herewith copies of pages 15 to 22, inclusive, of the annual report of the Five Civilized Tribes Agency for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1928, containing a statement as to the remaining tribal property of said tribes. It appears therefrom that the tribal lands and property of the Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole Nations have, with the exception of a few tracts, been allotted, sold, or otherwise disposed of as provided by law.

Of the undisposed-of property of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, the coal and asphalt deposits in the segregated mineral area of said nations constitute the principal item.

Under the act of Congress approved February 8, 1918 (40 Stat. L. 433), authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to appraise and offer for sale the coal and asphalt mineral deposits in the segregated area of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, said coal and asphalt mineral deposits were offered for sale three times and, out of a total of 517 tracts, but 94 tracts were sold.

Under the act of Congress approved February 22, 1921 (41 Stat. L. 1107), authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reappraise and offer for sale the remainder of the segregated coal and asphalt mineral deposits, in accordance with the act of February 8, 1918, as to terms and conditions of payments, a sale was held in 1925, at which time 426 tracts were offered for sale and only 4 were sold. The Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes in his report relative to the sale last above mentioned states as follows:

"This sale was attended by a very few prospective buyers, although the usual plan of advertising of sales had been used by this office—circulars, descriptive advertisements, and notices posted in post offices, banks, and other public places.

"The coal industry in Oklahoma at the present time is in a very bad condition and with but little prospect for improvement for some time to come. Operators are endeavoring to run their mines with non-union men, and, of course, this is causing more or less trouble with the unions. The falling off in the demand for coal due to the railroads and other industries using oil and gas, which has within the last two years reduced the output at least 50 per cent, has been one of the principal reasons for the depressed conditions existing at the present time.

"Further, a number of prospective purchasers, although responsible in every way, were unable to borrow funds to finance their intended purchases. A number of these have signified their intentions of making bids upon the mineral tracts desired as soon as financial arrangements can be made.

"It can not be expected that outside operators will come into Oklahoma and purchase mineral tracts with the intentions of opening new mines when they would have to face the unsatisfactory conditions now existing. However, a number of prominent men now operating mines in Oklahoma express their opinions that there were favorable indications of improvement which might come within a reasonable time.

"I do not think there should be a further effort made to offer for sale the coal and asphalt deposits until such time as it would be justified by a decided improvement in the present existing condition."

Subsequently bids from purchasers to buy three separate tracts at the appraised value were accepted.

In view of the conditions which have since existed relative to the coal and asphalt mining industry in Oklahoma, it has not been deemed advisable nor to the best interests of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations to offer during the past few years the tracts of the segregated coal and asphalt deposits for sale at public auction.

On September 25, 1928, the Franklin County Coal Co. filed a formal application for a 1-year option on the coal and asphalt deposits underlying certain tracts for the purpose of prospecting for coal and for the right to purchase, within the option period, upon certain terms and conditions set forth in the application the coal and asphalt deposits underlying said particular tracts.

In view of certain legal questions involved, the matter was taken up with the Solicitor for the Department of the Interior. A copy of the solicitor's opinion of November 19, 1928, relative to the matter is inclosed for your information. In view thereof the department declined to grant the application of the Franklin County Coal Co.

In view of the solicitor's opinion, it has been suggested that it might be to the best interests of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations if certain legislation might be obtained providing for the sale of the remainder of the segregated coal and asphalt deposits belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations and permitting the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion and under certain circumstances, to offer the tracts at either public auction or private sale at not less than the reappraised value, and to further provide that under certain circumstances he might grant options to purchase and grant to the party to whom such option might be given the right to prospect for coal and asphalt on the tracts covered by the option.

A copy of a draft of a bill setting forth the suggested legislation is inclosed for your further information. It may be said in regard thereto, however, that although the governor of the Chickasaw Nation is inclined to favor legislation along the line of the inclosed draft, the principal chief of the Choctaw Nation is opposed thereto.

It appears from your letter that you favor offering, during the present calendar year, for sale, after extensive advertising, the remaining tribal property of the Five Civilized Tribes, and especially the segregated coal and asphalt deposits belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations. In view of your letter, the matter of offering for sale at public auction at an early date said coal and asphalt deposits belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and other tribal property of the Five Civilized Tribes, will be taken up with C. L. Ellis, district superintendent in charge of the Five Civilized Tribes Agency, and he will be requested to submit a full report in the matter, with his views and recommendations as to what action should be taken. Upon receipt of his report the matter will be carefully considered and such action taken looking to the offering of the tribal property for sale at the earliest practicable date consistent with the best interest of the above-named Indian nations.

Very truly yours,

ROY O. WEST.

I have revised and amended the third section of the bill which I introduced on January 29, 1929 (H. R. 16696) and reintroduced it under the number H. R. 17022, providing for the sale of the remainder of the coal and asphalt deposits of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes. This revised section, in my judgment, affords every possible safeguard to the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes which will insure their getting a fair and adequate price for these coal and asphalt deposits, and I welcome any helpful or constructive suggestions which will be beneficial in the sale of these deposits.

Section 1 of the bill authorizes the reappraisement of these deposits and their sale at not less than the reappraised value, to the highest bidder, at public auction, or at private sale at not less than the reappraised value, and in the event there is no sale it permits, for the reasons stated in the Secretary's letter, after the deposits have been twice or more offered for sale at public auction, that the Secretary may grant options for terms of not to exceed six months to prospective purchasers to go upon the land and make tests and borings, in the hope that they may be induced to become interested in the purchase of the areas explored.

The second section makes plain that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to further reappraise the tracts remaining unsold.

Section 3 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, after any tract has been duly advertised and has been hereafter three times offered for sale at public auction, and twice hereafter reappraised, which, including the five times heretofore offered at public sale, means that these deposits will have been offered eight times at public sale and a number of times reappraised, including their reappraisal twice after the approval of this act; and remaining unsold, to again readvertise and sell at public auction to the highest bidder, regardless of the last reappraised value of any tract remaining unsold, reserving to the Secretary of the Interior the right to reject any and all bids, and as to any tract sold under this section, at less than the reappraised value, notice must be served upon the principal chief of the Choctaw Nation and the governor of the Chickasaw Nation and an opportunity given for a recommendation by them, and then the sale is to be consummated subject to the final approval of the President of the United States himself.

I want to secure for the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes the highest amount possible for these coal and asphalt deposits, and want to throw around their sale every safeguard; and I do not believe that anyone can successfully argue that after these deposits have been eight times offered at public sale over a period of 25 years and a number of times reappraised, with these safeguards, that these deposits will not bring a fair and adequate price. This section contemplates the ultimate sale of these deposits. Every effort is to be made to secure the best possible price. The tribes are protected against the deposits being sold at too low a price; first, by the proviso which is added reserving the right to the Secretary of the Interior to reject any and all bids, and second, the submission of any bid below the reappraised value to the principal chief of the Choctaw Nation and the governor of the Chickasaw Nation for their recommendation; and third, all sales under this section must be finally approved by the President of the United States.

With these safeguards thrown around the sale of these deposits and the final responsibility placed upon the President to protect the Indian wards of the Government, will not every member of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes rest assured that the best price obtainable will be secured by President Hoover, who is a mining engineer by profession, and in addition has had eight years' business experience as Secretary of Commerce?

The revised bill—H. R. 17022—is short, easily understood, and is as follows:

A bill providing for the sale of the remainder of the coal and asphalt deposits in the segregated mineral land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Oklahoma, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to reappraise and sell, at not less than the reappraised value, to the highest bidder at public auction and under such rules, regulations, terms, and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, the remainder of the coal and asphalt deposits, leased or unleased, in the segregated mineral lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Oklahoma, and belonging to said Indian nations: Provided, however, That where any tract of said coal and asphalt deposits has been or may be offered for sale at two or more public auctions after due advertisement and no sale thereof was made, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion and under such rules and regulations and on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, sell such tract at either public auction or by private sale at not less than the reappraised value: Provided further, That, in the cases of tracts of the coal and asphalt deposits that have been offered twice or more for sale at public auction and no sale made, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion and under such rules, regulations, terms, and conditions as he may prescribe, grant options for terms of not to exceed six months to purchase such coal and asphalt deposits and renew and extend any such option for an additional term or terms of not to exceed six months, giving and granting the right to make such tests and borings as may be necessary to demonstrate the nature and extent of such mineral deposits.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior may, in cases where tracts remain unsold and the facts are found to justify, cause further reappraisement to be made of such tracts.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, and under such rules, regulations, terms, and conditions as he may prescribe, in cases where any such tract or tracts of coal or asphalt deposits, after due advertisement, have been three times hereafter offered at public sale, and have been twice hereafter reappraised and remain unsold, cause any such tract or tracts to be readvertised and sold at public sale to the highest bidder, regardless of the last reappraised value of any such tract or tracts: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve and have the right to reject any and all bids and all sales under this section shall be subject to the approval of the President, after due notice given and opportunity for recommendation afforded to both the principal chief of the Choctaw Nation and the governor of the Chickasaw Nation: Provided further, That the terms of sale shall require full payment to be made, as now provided by law, within five years from date of approval of sale.

During a speech discussing this legislation on February 2, the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield there?

Mr. HASTINGS. I shall be glad to.

Mr. GARBER. Of course, the gentleman recognizes that we esteem him as one of the most capable and efficient representatives of the Indians of Oklahoma. I want to inquire whether or not his bill provides for exploration of the land before the bidding. Would it not be beneficial and advisable to permit an exploration before?

Mr. HASTINGS. If I did not make it clear in my remarks, I will say to my colleague that this bill does provide for that. Section 1 provides that it shall be offered at public sale and sold at not less than the appraised value. It provides for the reappraisement of the deposits. Then it provides that the deposits may be sold at private sale at not less than the apprised value, and it then authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to give permits to prospective purchasers to go on the various tracts and make explorations and such tests as they may see fit, which may be advantageous or helpful to them in deciding upon the amount of their next bid on any tract.

Mr. GARBER. These coal lands and asphalt lands are of great prospective value, are they not?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. And in order to induce outside capital to come into the State and contribute toward the best price, would it not be advisable to permit of exploration before making a bid?

Mr. HASTINGS. The bill authorizes that to be done as provided in section 1.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. As a matter of fact, the rules and regulations of the Land Office and the Interior Department both permit of making these explorations.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Secretary refers to and incloses an opinion of the Assistant Attorney General of the department, which I have not inserted in the RECORD because of its length, holding that the department did not have that right under existing law, and for that reason asks for this additional authority.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. How many acres of that land remain unsold?

Mr. HASTINGS. The number of tracts sold and remaining to be sold will be found in the Secretary's reply. His letter states that there were 517 tracts and that of these 94 have been sold.

Most of these tracts consist of 960 acres. Some few contain a less number of acres. Originally the total acreage consisted of 441,107.14 acres, and of this 46,254.56 acres have been sold and conveyed to purchasers, which leaves 394,852.58 acres remaining unsold at the present time. Of the unsold deposits 72,019.11 acres are covered by coal and asphalt mining leases still in force and effect. This leaves 322,833.47 acres of the segregated area unleased and from which no coal or asphalt is being mined and is therefore undeveloped. The mining leases on the area are expiring, and my information is that all will expire on September 25, 1932, and thereafter no royalty will be received for the benefit of the tribes.

What is to be done with these deposits after these leases expire in 1932? If royalty is not received from these leases how are the expenses of the tribal governments and of the schools thereafter to be paid?

As stated in my letter to the Secretary of the Interior the first agreement made between the Choctaw and the Chickasaw Tribes and the United States, providing for the making of the rolls of these tribes, the allotment of their lands, and the winding up of their affairs, was made on April 23, 1897, almost 32 years ago. The rolls were completed and all of their lands allotted more than 20 years ago. Leases were made on a number of tracts covering these coal and asphalt deposits. Many of these leases have expired and all will expire within the next three years. A few years ago large royalties were received from them. The report of the Department of the Interior, under date of January 30, 1929, shows that there was received and placed to the credit of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes, as royalty from coal and asphalt deposits for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, $88,843.81, while the tribal expenses for the same period aggregated $97,728.26.

This clearly shows that the royalties are falling off and are not sufficient to pay the current tribal expenses.

Three solutions have been proposed for the disposition of these coal and asphalt deposits:

First. That they be sold to the Government of the United States at their appraised value. A bill to this effect has been introduced in the House but was adversely reported upon by the Department of the Interior, and everyone familiar with the situation knows that there is no hope of inducing the Government to buy these deposits inasmuch as within the last few years coal has been developed under large areas of land in the Western States, some of which are public lands still owned by the Government.

Second. It has been suggested that these deposits be sold to the State of Oklahoma. No proposition has been made on behalf of the State to buy them and none is expected to be made. The bill which I have introduced would permit either the Government of the United States or the State of Oklahoma to purchase any or all tracts covering these deposits.

The third and the only sure and practical way to dispose of these deposits is to sell them to the highest bidder after due advertisement and after every effort is made to get the very best possible price for the tribes. These deposits have been offered for sale five times. Only a few tracts have been sold. Within the last few years oil and gas have been discovered under large areas throughout the South and West which come in competition with coal.

Since the final rolls were made it is estimated that more than one-third of the original allottees have died. The question of the determination of their heirs is becoming more complicated each year. The members of these tribes are entitled to have these coal and asphalt deposits sold to the very best advantage and they are entitled to have the proceeds thereof distributed among the enrolled members of the tribes.

In my judgment these deposits are not worth any more than the price for which they can be sold. Of course, I am anxious to get the greatest price possible, but surely everyone must appreciate that after these deposits have been hereafter offered three times at public sale and twice hereafter reappraised, and also offered at private sale, after prospective purchasers have been given the privilege of going upon the land and making tests, that every effort possible has been made to secure for these tribes the value of these deposits. If the members of these tribes had this money distributed among them per capita, it could be utilized to a splendid advantage in the improvement of their other lands, and in that way make them more valuable and productive. If a private estate had been delayed for 32 years in being wound up, the heirs would be entitled to complain against such an unreasonable delay. The members of these tribes are entitled to complain against the delays of Congress and the delays of the Department of the Interior in not taking the responsibility of selling these deposits after every effort has been made to secure for them all that they will bring after every precaution has been taken.

The interests of the members of these two tribes should, of course, be first considered and protected. The cities and towns contiguous to these deposits are vitally interested in their development. It would mean a larger population and more employment.

The counties in which these deposits are found and, in fact, the whole State are interested in having these deposits sold and developed, not only because the population of those sections would be increased but these properties would then be placed upon the tax duplicates and would aid in paying the local, county, and State expenses. Whether looked at from the standpoint of the members of the tribes or the citizenship of the community or from a State standpoint, every effort should be made to dispose of these coal and asphalt deposits.

At best it will require a few years—five or more—to dispose of them. In the meantime suits are being brought under the 1924 jurisdictional act in behalf of these tribes on all claims which they may have against the Government of the United States, and they should be determined within the time the coal and asphalt deposits are disposed of. When determined, and provided these coal and asphalt deposits are sold, the affairs of these two tribes should be completely wound up.

The responsibility is ours to prudently, cautiously, yet steadily, press these matters to their final solution. No one has offered any other solution; in fact, no one presses any solution. I have introduced this bill in the earnest hope that it may be enacted at an early day, believing that it will solve the question and will enable the department to dispose of these deposits, distribute the proceeds among the members of the tribes entitled to them, attract a larger population to the areas covered by these tracts, afford more employment to labor, place these coal and asphalt deposits upon the tax duplicates, and add to the general happiness and prosperity not only of the members of the tribes but the entire citizenship in the several counties in which these deposits are found and of the whole State. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the Cavalry has often been called the eyes of the Army. This was some years back, for the eyes are now elsewhere. The Air Corps performs this mission now, and the Cavalry, like many other things useful in their time, should now be relegated to the museums. It is out of date, and the sooner we recognize this reality the better off will be our Government; and were it not for the popularity of horseback riding in social circles, horses in the Army would have gone along with other antiquities.

Permit me to read a timely editorial from the Washington Times of January 28, discussing the Cavalry in the Army:

WE HAVE TANKS—WHY BOTHER WITH CAVALRY?

A caterpillar tractor equipped with heavy guns, fighting men inside of it, protected by thick armor is one of the most powerful and fearful weapons of modern war.

The tank, an American invention, developed here years ago, utilized by Europe in the Great War, can go almost anywhere.

It can cross streams, climb hills, crawl over rocks, traveling safely where horses can not go.

Such a tank as this could plow its way cruelly, remorselessly through 10,000 or 100,000 cavalry, mounted men and horses of the old kind.

The tank will keep going as long as its fuel lasts; horses and their riders could do no more against it than flies could do against cavalry horses.

Having this weapon, why does this country continue to spend money on cavalry and men that ride little horses, offering good targets to machine guns and bombs from the air, soft as putty before the attack of the fighting tank? The answer is simple.

It takes men a long time to change—a long time to adjust themselves to new conditions.

When they first made automobiles they put dashboards in the front, although there were no horses to kick mud against the dashboard.

When they first had steamboats they put sails on them, because they said: "What shall we do in case steam gave out? Of course, we must have sails."

Now they have the airplane, a machine costing $50,000, able to destroy with one bomb a $50,000,000 battleship; but they still build battleships.

And, having these tanks, they still equip and maintain cavalry regiments.

And, having airplanes in the air, they will for a while, at least, continue to send out infantry crawling along the ground like caterpillars.

A few gas bombs, able to kill everything within a square mile of where they land would, of course, soon end the infantry nonsense.

Nothing else will end it.

Skulls are thick, habit is strong, military and naval dodos are, many of them, too old to think.

And some of them are interested in the battleship building.

So the public spends hundreds of millions unnecessarily.

I quite heartily agreed with the writer of this editorial when I first read it and I still agree with him and still believe he is right, but in all fairness to those friends who believe differently I shall now submit their main reason why horses are needed in the Army, and I am now going to read their arguments as they appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of recent date. An eminent Senator, in part, said:

If we cut down the number of horses by one-half it not only discourages and demoralizes the Cavalry itself, but it also discourages the breeding of horses for the creation of this reservoir from which the Army makes its selection in order to obtain the required number of the proper kind of horses.

In other words, gentlemen of the House, we have the Cavalry, and we have two private mounts besides for certain Army officers costing the Government of the United States in the neighborhood of $750 per year per horse, so that the horse-breeding industry in the country will be encouraged.

Another eminent Senator said on this question "the important reason which should prevail against the House action in cutting down the number of private mounts of Army officers from two to one is that it is a very severe blow at the horse-breeding industry, which needs all the encouragement the Army can give it." There are only 692 horses involved in the House amendment, but it seems sufficiently large to injure seriously the horse-breeding industry, so the Senate put it back in the bill. We now see the reason why we need a Cavalry and why we need to give Army officers two mounts. It is all easy now. It is done to encourage the horse-breeding industry.

In all fairness, however, to the rest of us, those of us who are out of the Army and have not even one horse for our own amusement and that of our families, why make Army officers the favored class? Air Corps officers have mounts supplied to them by our generous Government. I understand Marine Corps officers are also taken care of. Of course, naval officers will follow. Then why exclude Senators and Congressmen if horses are provided merely for the purpose of encouraging the horse-breeding industry. There is excellent excuse for this, anyway, for the Senate Appropriations Committee recently discovered a valuable secret, that Senators, according to Army custom, are ranked as major generals and Congressmen are ranked as brigadier generals. Is it not about time for these new types of generals to be mounted? Delay is dangerous.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I recall that in the Army appropriation bill we had a provision which limited these mounts to one for each officer. I also recall that we had a provision in the bill curtailing the procurement activity of the Army, an activity that has been growing quite apace. It is my understanding that the Senate has adopted amendments striking out those provisions, and I am wondering if the conferees will insist on the viewpoint of the House on those matters.

Mr. COLLINS. Well, I can answer the gentleman only as regards my own individual case. I shall do all I can to keep the House amendments in the bill, but as far as being encouraged in the belief that they will stay in the bill it is my prediction that every worth while amendment made by the House will be eliminated and the bill will be finally passed just as the Army officers wish it. Frankly, horses in the Army are worthless. Procurement planning is a scheme to add more officers to the Army now topheavy with them. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Chairman, I shall address my remarks to the Hawaiian Sesquicentennial and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including therein the speeches of the President's special representative, Secretary Davis, Governor Farrington, certain of the foreign delegates, and my own.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Chairman, it is only a matter of 450-odd years since Christopher Columbus penetrated the unknown vastness of the oceans, braving the perils of nature and eventually reaching to this great continent of ours, to his everlasting fame and glory.

Explorers and discoverers have followed in his footsteps, both on land and sea. Recently, that intrepid breed have taken to the air, and who here does not recall the thrill we felt when it was known that our own Lindbergh, alone, had winged his way across the broad Atlantic?

We are too prone to soon forget such exploits when, as time flies by, these extraordinary undertakings are repeated and come to be the everyday occurrence. Those who have not braved the deep in sailing vessels, or even small steamers, can not conceive the perils and dangers that beset the captains when sailing unknown and uncharted seas. Even now, with the seas charted and weather forecasts being sent out twice daily by radio, we hear almost daily of innumerable difficulties besetting those that go down to the seas in ships.

One hundred and fifty years ago this date—February 14, 1779—there died one such captain, one of the band of unafraid whose name, even then, was honored, and who has since been acclaimed and recognized as one of the world's great navigators, discoverers, scientists, and humanitarians—Capt. James Cook, of the Royal Navy.

The life of Capt. James Cook makes a special appeal to us in America. Like so many of our successful men, he was of lowly origin, self-taught, and by his own endeavors rose to a high position and received some recognition for his attainments. We admire such traits because of the qualities of initiative and perserverance which they imply.

This man of the people, a product of that great naval service which has served so to mold the traditions of our own naval service, as commander of an expedition of two small sailing vessels three times circumnavigated the globe. He penetrated into the Arctic Ocean through Bering Straits, exploring the waters of our present Territory of Alaska; he sailed beyond the Antarctic Circle, where our own Commander Byrd is now engaged in completing the work. He was head of an astronomical expedition to observe the transit of Venus. He surveyed the approaches to the Gulf of St. Lawrence and took part in the campaign of General Wolf against Quebec. His services and explorations brought into the fold of the British Empire the continents of Australia and New Zealand. Last, but not least to us of Hawaii, this captain courageous made known to the world the Hawaiian Islands, that glorious Territory in the mid-Pacific—integral part of the United States—whose aspiration it is in the future to be represented in the union of the flag by a new star whose brightness none will surpass.

America can well associate herself with the rest of the world in recognizing the worth of Captain Cook's labors. Besides discovering what is now part of our country, it is worthy to note that his exploring expeditions were carried out during a time when we were still struggling with the mother country in the War of Independence. Though beset with the tribulations that come to a country under such circumstances, yet the work of this man was of such an outstanding character that Benjamin Franklin, then our minister plenipotentiary from the Congress of the United States to the court of France, found time to address a letter to all captains and commanders of armed ships of the United States of America, then in war with Great Britain, recommending to such commanders that the expedition of Captain Cook, his people, ships, and goods, should be treated with all civility and kindness, and that they should be assisted in their return to England:

To All Captains and Commanders of Armed Ships, Acting by Commission from the Congress of the United States of America, Now in War with Great Britain:

GENTLEMEN: A ship having been fitted out from England before the commencement of this war to make discoveries of new countries in unknown seas, under the conduct of that most celebrated navigator and discoverer, Captain Cook; an undertaking truly laudable in itself, as the increase of geographical knowledge facilitates the communication between distant nations in the exchange of useful products and manufactures and the extension of the arts, whereby the common enjoyments of human life are multiplied and augmented and science of other kinds increased to the benefit of mankind in general. This is, therefore, most earnestly to recommend to every one of you that in case the said ship, which is now expected to be soon in the European seas on her return, should happen to fall into your hands, you would not consider her as an enemy nor suffer any plunder to be made of the effects contained in her, nor obstruct her immediate return to England by retaining her or sending her into any other part of Europe or to America, but that you would treat the said Captain Cook and his people with all civility and kindness, affording them, as common friends to mankind, all the assistance in your power which they may happen to stand in need of. In so doing you will not only gratify the generosity of your own dispositions but there is no doubt of your obtaining the approbation of the Congress and your other American owners.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your most obedient, humble servant,

B. FRANKLIN,
Minister Plenipotentiary from the Congress of the United States to the Court of France.

At Passy, near Paris, this 10th day of March, 1779.

In Hawaii Captain Cook died, still in the prime of manhood, and last year as a consequence of an act of the territorial legislature, supported by a joint resolution of this Congress, and with the Secretary of War representing the President, the occasion was marked by ceremonies, memorial of his passing away, and also in commemoration of the rebirth of the Hawaiian Islands and their entrance into the family of nations.

Great Britain was represented by three men-of-war, and delegates from the Empire and the Dominions interested in the explorations of this great man. A monument was dedicated on the island of Kauai at the point where Captain Cook first landed and a tablet was unveiled at the spot where he died. A historical tableau and literary exercises brought the ceremonies to a close in the city of Honolulu.

Time has softened the feelings on one part and the other, so that the angry passions of 150 years ago are replaced by a feeling of friendliness, by that spirit of aloha for which the Hawaiian has come to be so well known. I am hopeful that these ceremonies will have done their little share toward advancing that better understanding between the English-speaking peoples for which we are ever striving. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF HON. DWIGHT F. DAVIS, SECRETARY OF WAR, AS OFFICIAL REPRESENTATIVE OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE SESQUICENTENNIAL OF THE DISCOVERY OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS, AT HONOLULU, AUGUST 15 TO 20, 1928

Through the commemoration of significant events in our history we dedicate milestones by which we may measure the course of our progress. At the same time we are afforded an opportunity for a retrospection which never fails to serve as an inspiration for further progress.

The importance of the discovery of the Hawaiian Islands has increased with each of the 150 years since Capt. James Cook landed upon these shores. The value of his discovery has been enhanced by succeeding generations of its inhabitants. Consequently, to-day when we commemorate the arrival here of Captain Cook we honor his accomplishment the more if we evaluate the progress of Hawaii and depict the possibilities of its future.

The Government of the United States has commissioned me to come and express to you the congratulations of the Nation upon your accomplishments and to join with you in a celebration of the fortuitous occasion of the introduction of this highly endowed land and people to the acquaintance of the world. The Federal Government does not join in these exercises solely because they are of consequence to the people of an integral part of the United States. The participation is more intimate. The occasion affords an opportunity for an expression of national appreciation of the good fortune which brought to the attention of mankind these islands which have become an important element of our great Union.

Scientists have depicted the formation of the universe in accordance with the basic natural phenomenon of the attraction between masses. They visualize the action of a cosmic, inherent force which, operating to join innumerable particles, gave permanence to the creation we know to-day. We gain an impression of some similar attraction when we view the years of political progress which led to the union of our States with Hawaii to form the present United States of America. We are conscious that here is an example where peoples gravitated steadily to a peaceful combination much as though they, too, were drawn together by an inherent and irresistible force of nature. The union was accomplished and has been maintained as a normal step in the destinies of those geographical elements which now constitute the United States of America.

Prior to the visit of Captain Cook to these islands two great leaders were engaged in constructive and similar efforts in two distantly separated parts of our present large domain. On the Atlantic seaboard George Washington was marshaling the scattered forces by which he eventually gained independence and a political entity for our colonies. Here in Hawaii, Kamehameha I was engaged in those lifelong efforts which resulted in political unity. Unknown to the rest of the world he was exhibiting those qualities of leadership and statesmanship which entitle him to high recognition among all great men.

Since those days there have come representatives of many nationalities to join the original inhabitants and settlers in both our island and continental territories. Everywhere there has resulted a considerable fusion of the blood of our founders. However, regardless of the numerous elements which have entered into our society and have influenced our customs, there has been preserved the liberty and unity secured through the efforts of Washington and the first Kamehameha.

Captain Cook found in these beautiful islands a race of stalwart, sport-loving, and lovable people who had developed an aristocracy and many courtly graces. He was received with a remarkable hospitality—a trait which has continued to the present day as an especial characteristic of Hawaiians. Unfortunately, for the first 40 years after 1778 many of the visitors to these shores appeared to have abused their welcome. Not until 1820, with the advent of the missionaries, does there appear to have been much altruism in those who came here either to bargain or to live.

With the arrival of the missionaries there came to these lands an influence which became a most potent factor in their destiny. The record of a majority of those devout men and women constitutes a notable example of constructive service to mankind. They brought from our oldest States on the Atlantic seaboard the good will which ever since has characterized the relations between our peoples. Furthermore, they introduced here their customs and ideals so that, with the passage of time, laws and practices became similar in Hawaii and in our States. Thus to the missionaries more than to any other social group must we give credit for the basic qualities which ultimately occasioned a natural fusion of our population.

It must be a matter of satisfaction to us all that prior to the incorporation of the Territory of Hawaii into the United States our Federal Government had proved repeatedly its friendliness to Hawaii as an independent State and its unwillingness to undertake any form of coercion. Commencing with the negotiations of Capt. Thomas Catsby Jones, United States Navy, in 1826, the relations of the two countries always were based on mutual respect and confidence.

Thus in 1842 the American Government made it clear that it did not desire any exclusive control or advantage and advised the King of Hawaii through his commissioners as to the method of approach to England and France in diplomatic negotiations to secure treaties for the guaranty of independence and neutrality. The action of the United States a year later in expressing disapproval of the occupation of Hawaii by a British naval commander undoubtedly had considerable effect toward recognition of Hawaiian independence by England and France and in their joint agreement in 1843 never to take possession even under a protectorate.

In December, 1849, there was concluded between the United States and Hawaii a treaty of friendship, commerce, navigation, and extradition. Two years later the benevolent Kamehameha III sought the protection of the United States by the preparation of an instrument whereby he might cede his monarchy to the United States should his power be put in jeopardy by any other nation. The attitude of the United States was expressed by Daniel Webster, Secretary of State, as follows:

"The government of the Sandwich Islands ought to be respected; that no power ought to take possession of the islands either as a conquest or for the purpose of colonization; and that no power ought to seek for any undue control over the existing government or any exclusive privileges or preferences in matters of commerce."

From time to time, between 1853 and the accomplishment of annexation in 1898, there arose proposals in both the United States and Hawaii for the unification of the two countries. The long delay in the accomplishment of this aim is proof of the sincere intention of our Federal Government to act only in accord with the wishes of the Hawaiian people. Indeed, after the new provisional government of Hawaii in 1893 had raised the American flag and applied for entrance into the United States, President Cleveland appears to have delayed his acquiescence entirely by reason of a concern lest the action of an American naval force had been prejudicial to the success of the rebellion against the Hawaiian monarch. Finally, however, the Spanish-American War carried the Stars and Stripes beyond the North American Continent, and public opinion rapidly consummated the union.

So much for the past. Let us now consider the future.

The frontiers of civilization have moved steadily westward through the ages. With that progress there has occurred a westward displacement of the world center. From Athens to Rome and to London has moved the hub of the world. The Mediterranean gave way in importance to the Atlantic. Now the Pacific Ocean steadily gains as an avenue of world progress.

We have seen these islands steadily increase in prestige with the improvement of transportation and intercommunication between the peoples of the world. First came the replacement of sails by steam power. Then came steady improvement of engines to facilitate travel and improve commerce. As science overcame handicaps the continents were brought closer as regards time which is the true gauge of distance. With each forward step this "Crossroads of the Pacific" received an added incentive to progress.

Were industry and trade the sole reasons for Hawaiian importance, and were the sea the only medium of access to these islands still your dominating position would assure you complete participation in the benefits which appear destined for the countries of the Pacific. However, we find here attractions for other than the industrialist and the trader. You have contrived to enhance the bounteous attractions of nature with a comfort which emanates from excellent hospitality dispensed with a natural and charming cordiality. Hawaii has become a goal for all travelers, and each year in greater numbers they come in quest of recreation and the enjoyment of this beautiful land where are combined the attractions of the Orient and Occident.

Nor do we longer limit our conception of transoceanic travel to ships of the sea. Little more than a year ago two officers of the Army, Lieutenants Maitland and Hegenberger, first negotiated the flight to these islands from San Francisco—a feat in which I take especial pride—since it was undertaken as a military venture under my approval as Secretary of War. Since then, other daring aviators also have proved the practicability of such flights. Quite recently you welcomed the intrepid crew which stopped here on the epochal journey by air from California to Australia. We can not say when or how such travel may become a common practice. We only know that if aviation continues its astounding progress of the past few years, these islands will become one of the most important airports of the world. In any event, the future lies bright before Hawaii.

This celebration has been given an especial importance through the gracious participation of many of those countries which have been associated with the development of the lands of the Pacific and the Hawaiian Islands. Though the exploits and accomplishments of Captain Cook have been of advantage to all nations, they remain a glowing example of the results which have accrued from the far-flung interest and initiative of his own country. Therefore, on this occasion of honor to the services of Captain Cook, we extend our compliments to Great Britain and to Australia and New Zealand. We thank them for their courtesy in sharing with us in these honors to their countrymen who caused their flag to be the first sighted from these shores.

The Government of the United States feels a debt of gratitude to Captain Cook. His introduction of this "Paradise of the Pacific" to the society of nations has proved of inestimable benefit to our Nation. On behalf of the Federal Government, I voice appreciation for this opportunity to participate in these exercises and to express the thankfulness of the Nation for the advent of Hawaii to the knowledge of mankind.

ADDRESS BY GOV. WALLACE R. FARRINGTON, OF HAWAII, AT HONOLULU, AUGUST 18, 1928

Every period of history has given us men fired with an ambition to break through into the unknown.

Especial honor is given to the comparative few who, as they went out, charted a course so that others might follow. Such leaders have usually made the greatest contributions, and it is noted that with their courage they have possessed a sense of responsibility to others that is quite apart from reckless daring.

Capt. James Cook, the explorer and geographer, in whose honor the representatives of the English-speaking nations are here assembled, had the ambition, the courage, and the capacity for contagious inspiration that qualified him to be a successful leader destined to leave a permanent record. Few men in history have contributed more than he in placing new lands and new opportunities within the grasp of his own and succeeding generations.

In this year 1928, 150 years after Captain Cook and men of his ship's company set foot on these islands, the descendants of the discoverers and of the discovered join happily in appropriate ceremonies to honor his memory.

The people of Hawaii, through their legislative assembly, elected under universal suffrage, officially requested that the Government of the United States, of which this Territory is an integral part, extend an invitation for the meeting here of the representatives of English-speaking nations and dominions. We are all beneficiaries in the new worlds opened up by Captain Cook. While we unite in the tribute of honor to an heroic figure of the past, we may find in this new inspiration for achievement in the present and for the future.

Captain Cook opened the eyes of the then civilized world to new fields the extent and conditions of which had not been pictured in the visions of even the dreamers. His charting of the hitherto unknown ocean and shore brought to Hawaii's people new counsellors. Barbarism was wiped out. Free scope was given to the normal friendly instincts of the native Hawaiian people. In a remarkably short period Hawaii and the Hawaiians moved into a position where they have exercised a reciprocal influence in fostering a more practical and sincere friendliness among all the peoples of the islands and the lands in and about the Pacific.

Other speakers will sketch the steps in the path of historical events that have brought us to the generally happy conditions of the present time. My pleasant duty and privilege is to extend the welcome, the aloha of Hawaii, on behalf of the citizens and residents of the Territory of Hawaii, and especially of the citizens of native Hawaiian ancestry.

The years immediately following the arrival of Captain Cook were for Hawaii years of upheaval and turmoil. When conditions began to settle down and orderly methods took the place of chaos, it is interesting, and we hope significant, to note the spirit of friendly cooperation that characterized the relations of the Hawaiians and the men and women of the English-speaking nations.

The Hawaiian monarch, Kamehameha I, retained John Young, who helped very materially in the successful battles fought by the King.

As time went on and constitutional government was finally established, the ruler of Hawaii called to his assistance the Hon. Robert C. Wyllie to serve as Minister of Foreign Affairs. Mr. Wyllie was a British subject who accepted Hawaiian citizenship and loyally served his adopted nation. The premier and adviser of equal authority in this period was Dr. Gerrit P. Judd, a citizen of the United States, who linked his fortunes with the Hawaiian Kingdom. He gave the best years of his life in loyal service.

These men were united in their purpose to support and maintain the integrity of the Hawaiians.

About this time the Hawaiian people, moving into the sphere of international relations, adopted a national flag. You see this flag to-day in the Territorial emblem. It is a union of the British and the American flags. The British flag was the first national banner known to the Hawaiians. The union jack was used. The eight stripes of the flag represent the eight principal islands of their kingdom, following the stripes of the flag of the United States representing the thirteen original States.

There is no historical record that this design was ever changed or even the subject of any bitter differences of opinion that are so often reflected in a national emblem.

When the United States accepted the petition of Hawaii for annexation there was no breath of opposition to the adoption of the former national flag as the emblem of the Territory.

All along the course of events that has made history in the Pacific the Hawaiians, the British, and the Americans of the United States have been in hearty accord. Not to suggest that never were there differences of opinion. Residents of these islands 150, 100 years, and 75 years ago were quite human. They were active and vigorous in the expression of their opinions. We honor them for the balanced judgment that finally prevailed and for the good standard established to influence and largely control subsequent events.

In Captain Cook's time the venturesome men were seeking physical worlds to conquer.

To-day our central thought is to discover the most approved routes for arriving at permanent friendly relationships. Having learned through Captain Cook how large is our world, we are engaged in the great adventures involved in learning that the world is big enough for all to live comfortably, with a fair share for each of the reasonable prosperity that assures contentment.

The disaster in Captain Cook's last voyage to Hawaii is not without a guiding thought.

Ignorance and misunderstanding, superstition and fear, shaped the incidents that led up to the death of the great explorer. Looking back, we have a feeling of pity for the benighted people who first deified as their great god Lono, the visitor from the great unknown; then, finding their mistake, destroyed him.

In the perspective of a century and a half we can understand the folly of it all. Looking out upon the future we have reason to highly resolve that the understanding and friendships that have become traditional along the ocean routes of the Pacific shall be emphasized.

The late Lord Bryce, in his Modern Democracies, quotes from Disraeli, where a character in one of his novels says, "Few ideas are correct ones, and what are correct no one can ascertain; but with words we govern men."

The "aloha" of Hawaii, the word of friendliness, has had continuing power. Suspicion and intrigue have scored destructive failures.

As the people of Hawaii voice the national greeting of a kind-hearted race, it carries the thought that this meeting and your stay in these islands will be more far-reaching than a mere pleasant memory.

A timely word can control the minds of men. Courage to strike out into new fields in human relationships may well be expressed in a determination to use words and be prompt to perform the deeds that will strengthen old friendships and build new friendships. Profiting by the past, we will exercise the intelligence born of our present-day enlightenment so as to make those friendships permanent landmarks for charting the progress of the new world of our day.

ADDRESS OF C. B. HOFGARD, PRESIDENT OF KAUAI HISTORICAL SOCIETY AND CHAIRMAN OF THE KAUAI COOK CELEBRATION COMMITTEE, AT WAIMEA, KAUAI, AUGUST 17, 1928

Ladies and gentlemen, 150 years ago that illustrious navigator, Capt. James Cook, Royal Navy, who had already made two voyages round the world, sailed from the island of Bolabola, one of the Society Islands, to explore the west coast of the American Continent and to find a passage north of America, which last part of the plan has just been accomplished in our time after numerous unsuccessful attempts.

He sighted Oahu, but on account of unfavorable wind kept sailing northwest and saw Kauai and sailed along the south coast and landed on the beach of Waimea on the 20th of January, 1778.

We hail Captain Cook as the discoverer of Hawaii, although Spanish navigators had a nebulous information of some islands near here. Captain Cook recorded his discoveries and scientifically located Hawaii on this terrestrial globe. He is entitled to all the honor of discovery as much as that other intrepid navigator, Christopher Columbus, who discovered America, although other Europeans had visited America as much as 400 years before his time.

We, the people of Kauai, under the auspices of the Kauai Historical Society, have raised a monument in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the discovery, which I as president of the Kauai Historical Society have the honor and pleasure to present to the county of Kauai.

SIR JOSEPH CARRUTHERS, OFFICIAL REPRESENTATIVE OF THE GOVERNMENT OF AUSTRALIA TO THE CAPTAIN COOK SESQUICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION, AT THE SCENE OF THE DEATH OF CAPT. JAMES COOK, KAAWALOA, KEALAKEKUA BAY, HAWAII

We stand to-day on ground sacred to the memory of one of the bravest and best of men, Capt. James Cook, of the Royal Navy of Great Britain. It was on this very spot that his life's blood ebbed away 150 years ago. He died leaving an imperishable name that as the ages roll on shall never be forgotten by those who honor and revere him for those fine qualities of courage, of devotion to duty, and of humanity, as well as for his outstanding ability as a sailor and as a leader of sailors.

When the news of his death was brought to England a public monument was proposed, yet it did not materialize until long years after.

But his closest and best friend, his former commander and patron, the man who knew him most intimately, Sir Hugh Palliser, erected at his own expense at his family seat, Mache Park, Buckinghamshire, a square block of stone surmounted by a globe and inclosed by a neat but simple roofed building. On this monument Palliser caused to be inscribed these words:

"To the memory of Capt. James Cook, the ablest and most renowned navigator this or any other country has ever produced."

That inscription from such a man as Palliser, who rose to the high rank of comptroller of the navy, constitutes the most valuable testimony to his great reputation amongst his contemporaries, who knew him best from actual and long association with him.

Since that time—about 148 years ago—many monuments have been erected, amongst others a very fine one at the Admiralty in London, which I was mainly instrumental in securing as the result of a letter to the London Times which I wrote and published in 1908. Monuments now abound right through the Pacific as well as in England and Australasia to commemorate Captain Cook's great work.

In St. Paul's Cathedral, London, there is a tablet to the memory of Sir Christopher Wren with these words upon it:

"If you seek his monument, look around you."

So if you seek Captain Cook's monument, travel, as I have done, in the Pacific and look around you.

Then you will see the great Continent of Australia, with its 7,000,000 people of one race, who are on the way to found a great and a united nation of happy and prosperous people that will in the course of the present century be in the south Pacific just what the United States are in the north. Next look and see the Dominion of New Zealand, with over 1,000,000 people of the British race, happy, prosperous, and contented. See also the many other islands which he discovered or visited—Samoa, Tonga, the Cook Islands, New Caledonia, and, last but not least, these beautiful Hawaiian Isles, the outpost of the United States.

Look also at the Pacific States of the United States, which sprang into existence as the direct sequence of Cook's discovery of these islands; and if you look still farther north, see Canada and realize that it was Cook who charted the course for General Wolfe which resulted in the capture of Abrahams Heights and thereby laid the foundation of what is now the Dominion of Canada.

These are the monuments to Cook's life and work, and they are imperishable.

Captain Cook was a most humane man, as witness the fact that in 11 years of exploration in unknown parts where he came in contact with lands having millions of untutored races less than 1 man for each of those 11 years perished as the result of any conflicts. About 10 natives were killed in unavoidable conflicts in 11 years of his voyaging. There has never been, in all the world's history, such a record of peaceful methods of dealing with strange people. Compare that record with the conquest of Southern and Central America and of Mexico by the Spanish. Even in North America there was a trail of almost interminable bloodshed in the early days of colonization and discovery.

Why did Cook leave such a unique record? Simply because he deliberately set himself to the task of avoiding conflicts with the natives, whilst aiming at winning their friendship by peaceful means.

Cook's death would never have occurred in February, 1779, but for the fact that he went ashore on this place, trusting to his ability to gain the good will of the Hawaiians by peaceful means in a period of difficulty. At a critical moment when his men in the boats lying close to here fired a volley into the ranks of the natives menacing him, Cook turned his back on the natives, held up his hands to his officers and men, and ordered them to desist from firing. That very act of humane feeling cost Cook his life, for with his back turned he was clubbed and killed.

I have studied more thoroughly than most living men the whole of the recorded facts, and I unhesitatingly say that the events which led up to the death of Captain Cook on that fatal day were the result of a complete and mutual misunderstanding that suddenly arose. The very action of Cook in striving to avoid bloodshed resulted in the sacrifice of his own life.

Many untrue statements have been made and have passed into current history without justification regarding the events leading up to the death of Captain Cook. I am satisfied that with a more complete and impartial study of the ample evidence available, the memory of Captain Cook will be found to be free from any stain of wrongdoing on his part.

May I say here and now that these proceedings to commemorate the events of 150 years ago with which Captain Cook was associated will be regarded throughout Great Britain, throughout Australia and New Zealand, and in all other parts of the Empire of which I am a humble citizen, as a splendid gesture indicative of the friendship which exists between the people of the United States and those of the British Empire. May that friendship forever continue for the benefit of humanity and as an enduring influence for the peace of the world.

Just now the whole world is being gladdened with the welcome tidings that the nations which compose the British Empire have entered into a bond with the United States of America and with France and Italy to outlaw wars of aggression. Happily that event synchronizes with the one hundred and fiftieth year of Cook's death and with the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

The spirit of James Cook has largely contributed to that accomplishment inspired as it has been largely by the English-speaking people of the world. My fellow countrymen in Australia are thrilled with a feeling of joy and of fraternity by these celebrations inaugurated by their big brother Jonathan, the United States.

I feel it to be an honor to the young communities of Australia and of New Zealand that we are here associated with the people of the United States and of this Territory in these historic proceedings.

In sending me here as her envoy Australia wished most appropriately to be associated with these proceedings.

Our history comprises three periods:

"First. Cook's discovery of Australia and its first settlement.

"Second. The grant of representatives, institutions, and responsible government.

"Third. The foundation of the United Australian Commonwealth."

Largely because for over 40 years I have served as minister and legislator in the second period and am one of the few surviving founders of our Federal constitution, I was selected and have been appointed as the first envoy under the terms agreed upon at the last imperial conference, which conferred the right on every dominion of direct representation in another country.

Thus, the link is preserved which connects Australia with its first foundation.

Australia was discovered and founded without the shedding of one drop of blood.

The inspiration of Cook's spirit has ever been with us. Loyalty, service, justice, and humanity in all our doings.

As to loyalty, William Charles Wentworth in his poem, Australia, wrote:

"And thou, Britannia, shouldst thou cease to ride,
Despotic Empress of old ocean's tide,
May this, thy last-born infant, then arise
To greet with gladness thy parent eyes,
And Australasia float with flag unfurled
A new Britannia in another world."

That spirit of loyalty and service caused us in the hour of peril to send over 400,000 of our sons across the seas to fight for a great cause when 60,000 of our bravest and best made the supreme sacrifice.

The spirit of Cook inspired that loyalty and that service. That spirit is not dead. It will never die.

I may be forgiven perhaps if I single out one man who above all others has nobly wrought to bring about this day. And that man is Governor Farrington, who has played his part as a leader of men from first to last in advocating and accomplishing this good work.

I do not believe that we should allow these proceedings to pass by without reflecting on what is our duty to those fine though simple races in all these Pacific lands. I hope that we shall take stock of the position and endeavor to make provision to save and uplift these races for our honor and credit and for their preservation in happiness and content.

That would perpetuate the spirit of Cook and his consistent sense of humanity to these people.

Our hero, Captain Cook, is dead.

"Life's fitful fever o'er, he sleeps well."

But his spirit lives forevermore. It is for us to remember those sweet lines which so eloquently breathe what is our duty:

"Of those who in the dust do dwell
May there kindly mention be
When the birds that build in the branches tell
Of the planting of the tree."

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN C. LANE, OF HAWAII, AT THE UNVEILING OF A BRONZE TABLET SET JUST BENEATH THE WATER AT THE SPOT WHERE CAPT. JAMES COOK WAS KILLED, AT KAAWALOA, KEALAKEKUA BAY, ISLAND OF HAWAII, ON FEBRUARY 14, 1779, DELIVERED AT THE SPOT ON AUGUST 18, 1928

Secretary Dwight F. Davis, of the United States War Department, personally representing President Coolidge in the Territory, His Excellency the Governor of Hawaii, Gerald H. Phipps, His Britannic Majesty's consul, other distinguished guests, and fellow citizens, on this hallowed ground 150 years ago, Capt. James Cook, the discoverer of these beautiful islands, met his death here in Kaawaloa, and we are assembled to-day to pay homage and honor to his memory.

Whatever may have been the hard feelings engendered in the past, time has softened and effaced them. To-day we stand near the very spot where he expired, with hearts full of gratitude for the good rendered by him to mankind, and with feelings of appreciation for the knowledge he gave to navigation.

Civilization acclaims him a great discoverer and scientist, and this Territory our benefactor.

His name will always be repeated by the young in schools, and by the old, admired for his achievements as a navigator.

I need not dwell at length with the life of this man, the main speaker of the day, Sir Joseph Carruthers, will furnish us in full. Mine is the honor, as an Hawaiian, to unveil the bronze tablet, and therefore in the name of the Hawaii of old and the Hawaii of to-day, I hereby do perform this honorable duty gladly.

[Here unveil]

Fellow citizens, in removing the old Crown flag of the monarchial days of the Hawaiian Islands from this memorial bronze tablet, I find these words inscribed thereon:

"Near this spot Capt. James Cook, R. N., was killed February 14, 1779."

Let the people of the Territory behold these beautiful and historical surroundings—the world told of the celebration held in these far-distant isles, where the two great powers of our modern age, Great Britain and America, have joined hands on this occasion, and thereby promote feelings of friendship.

From this day henceforth, let the aloha of the Hawaiian race penetrate the soil of this sacred and hallowed spot, and let God lead us all, to do what is right and just, one race to another race, in the affairs of mankind.

REPLY BY COMMODORE G. T. C. P. SWABEY, D. S. O., ROYAL NAVY, TO THE ADDRESS OF WELCOME TO THE VISITORS MADE ON BEHALF OF THE KONA CIVIC CLUB AT KAAWALOA WHEN THE CAPTAIN COOK MONUMENT WAS DECORATED ON SATURDAY, AUGUST 18, 1928

Mr. Secretary, ladies, and gentlemen, standing here on this little bit of British territory, and speaking on behalf of the officers and men of the British warships here assembled for this memorable ceremony, I would like to thank the speaker very much for the words of welcome he has addressed to us.

We of the British Navy are very proud of Captain Cook and of his great achievements and of the high traditions for which he and other great sailors of the past have stood.

It is therefore a matter of great satisfaction to us that it has been found possible to assemble here to-day three British cruisers to do honor to this great occasion—Cornwall, representing Great Britain; Brisbane, representing the Commonwealth of Australia; and Dunedin, representing the Dominion of New Zealand.

We are very proud that this tribute is being paid to a great Englishman and a great sailor by the citizens of the United States of America, and we are very grateful for the invitation which has been extended to us to take part with you in these memorable celebrations.

DELEGATE HOUSTON'S ADDRESS, AUGUST 17

CIVILIZATION IN HAWAII AT TIME OF CAPTAIN COOK'S DISCOVERY

(Following is the address of Delegate VICTOR S. K. HOUSTON at the unveiling of the monument to Captain Cook at Waimea, Kauai, erected by the Kauai Historical Society. The address which will be delivered at 9 o'clock this morning was released for publication in the Advertiser by Delegate HOUSTON before he sailed for Kauai with the sesquicentennial commission last night:)

We are met to celebrate the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the discovery of the islands of the Hawaiian group, since erected into a Territory of the United States, and to do honor to the achievement of one of the greatest navigators of the world, the discoverer.

On the 18th of January, 1778, Capt. James Cook, of the Royal Navy, in command of a scientific and exploring expedition, sent out by the British Admiralty, first sighted the island of Oahu, and named the group, of which Oahu was one, the Sandwich Islands.

Captain Cook was one of that hardy race of mariners of which Great Britain has been so prolific. His fame rests not alone upon this one discovery. His is the renown that comes to men invading the deep blue sea and opening up new worlds. His is the glory that rewards application, perseverance, and that stoutheartedness that carries certain men into the unknown. He filled in the blank spaces on the world's map and established a reputation as a scientist that is second only to his position as an explorer.

I could not add to his reputation—it is already so solidly founded. Other speakers during this celebration will make known to us details of his life and character, which it is well in this day we should know. But as a Hawaiian, I believe it will not be out of place if in this short paper I should address myself to the subject of the people whom this great man discovered, and by means of a collection of quotations and extracts from the Reports of the Voyage to show the state of civilization in which they were found.

One hundred and fifty years is but the briefest period in the life history of any people. But into this particular period there has been crowded the development of this people, reaching from its stone age to an assimilation of modern civilization. When Captain Cook arrived they had neither metals nor pottery, no textile of any kind, no written language, and apparently they had been isolated in the midst of the vast Pacific for ages untold.

When into this garden spot—now aptly termed the paradise of the Pacific—there erupted these hardy mariners, product of a gradually developed civilization, thousands of years old, it is not strange that the habits and customs of the Hawaiians should have startled and astonished them. It would be the same had any of us been carried back to the times of the Pharaohs or to that age which appropriately is known in history as the stone age.

As a consequence, the Hawaiians were frequently referred to as savages and barbarians. That they were primitive may be readily granted, but that they were wild, untamed, uncivilized, or uncultured—the equivalent of the word so often used—is simply a statement of comparison rather than of fact. That they were barbarians is equally untenable, for they were not cruel, or brutal, but were, as I hope to show, kindly and hospitable, friendly and frank. If the word is taken in its narrow sense, such as it was used by Greeks to mean non-Hellenes, or as used later by Latins—even now by Italians to mean foreigners in a deprecatory sense—the word is undoubtedly applicable. I like to feel that the terms were rather thoughtlessly applied.

Abraham Fornander, who 50 years ago wrote the "Polynesian Race," said of the Hawaiian, "* * * a people whom none knew till 100 years ago, and whom no one even now recognized as a chip off the same block from which the Hindu, the Iranian, and the Indo-European families are fashioned." He claimed that they were descended from a people that was agnate to, but far older than, the Vedic family of the Aryan race; that it entered into India before these Vedic Aryans; that there it underwent a mixture with the Dravidian race, which, as in the case of the Vedic-Aryan themselves, has permanently affected its complexion; that there also, in greater or less degree; it became moulded to the Cushite-Arabian civilization of that time; it established itself in the Indian Archipelago at an early period, and thence was probably forced into the Pacific.

Fornander assumes the following steps in this later migration:

(a) At the close of the first and during the second century of the present era, the Polynesians left the Asiatic Archipelago and entered the Pacific, establishing themselves on the Fiji groups and thence spreading to the Samoan, Tonga, and other groups eastward and northward.

(b) During the fifth century, Polynesians settled in the Hawaiian Islands and remained there comparatively unknown until—

(c) The eleventh century A. D. when several parties of fresh immigrants from the Marquesas, Society, and Samoan groups arrived at the Hawaiian Islands, and for the space of five or six generations, revived and maintained an active intercourse with the first-named groups.

(d) From the close of this era, about 21 generations ago, Hawaiian history runs isolated from other Polynesian groups till 1778.

Now, if you will kindly bear with me, I will make use of a collection of extracts and quotations from the published reports of the voyage, which will, I hope, give you a picture of the people whose civilization was of no mean order, whose characteristics were marked by kindness and hospitality, and whose capacity and ingenuity was such that in the course of the last 150 years they have been able, to a very large extent, to assimilate and adapt themselves to the revolutionary changes brought about by contact with the rest of the world.

I apologize for the manner of their presentation. The time at my command has been brief. Extracts and quotations may be somewhat mixed, and I may not have been consistent in my spelling of native names. My efforts have been to collate in sequence the varied references to matters not so well known as they are found in the voyage report. I have purposely omitted geographical data and detail reference to matters that are better known through later study, such as the feather cloaks, heiaus, religion, etc.; I have also omitted generally matters that were not the result of direct observation.

Captain Cook and his collaborators were keen observers, and the facts they observed, not always their conclusions, are the most valuable contributions to our knowledge of this race. For the changes in customs and habits came with lightninglike rapidity thereafter, and later students were not always able to make the proper distinction as between the old standards and the new modifications.

I hope that a study of this data will lead to a more sympathetic attitude with respect to this race, to an understanding of the psychology of the people, and to a feeling, perhaps, that after all they were neither savages nor barbarians. The Romans at the time when Christians were pitted against wild beasts in the arena of the Coliseum are not classed as such; then why should our people be so classed because of religious sacrifices. The religious wars in Europe and the burning of witches in New England—many more parallels could be offered to show savagery perhaps in other lands—I simply wish a broader understanding of our people of whose history we feel we have a right to be proud.

GENERAL APPEARANCE

"These people did not exceed the ordinary size and were stoutly made. Their complexion was brown; and there appeared to be little difference in the casts of their color, there was a considerable variation in their features. Most of them had their hair cropped rather short; a few had it tied in a bunch at the top of the head; and others suffered it to flow loose. It seemed to be naturally black; but the generality of them had stained it with some stuff which communicated to it a brownish color. Most of them had pretty long beards. They had no arms about their persons; nor did we observe that they had their ears perforated. Some of them were tatooed on the hands, or near the groin; and the pieces of cloth which were worn by them round their middle were curiously colored with white, black, and red. They seemed to be mild and good natured; and were furnished with no arms of any kind, except small stones, which they had manifestly brought for their own defense; and these they threw into the sea when they found that there was no occasion for them.

"From what continent they originally emigrated, and by what steps they have spread through so vast a space, those who are curious in disquisitions of this nature, may, perhaps, not find it very difficult to conjecture. It has been already observed that they bear strong marks of affinity to some of the Indian tribes that inhabit the Ladrones and Caroline Islands; and the same affinity may again be traced amongst the Battas and the Malays. When these events happened is not so easy to ascertain; it was probably not very late, as they are extremely populous and have no tradition of their own origin but what is perfectly fabulous; whilst on the other hand, the unadulterated state of their general language, and the simplicity which prevails in their customs and manners, seem to indicate that it could not have been at any distant period.

"The inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands are undoubtedly of the same race with those of New Zealand, the Society and Friendly Islands, Easter Islands, and the Marquesas. This fact, which, extraordinary as it is, might be thought sufficiently proved by the striking similarity of their manners and customs and the general resemblance of their person is established beyond all controversy, by the absolute identity of their language.

PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

"The natives of these islands are, in general, above the middle size and well made; they walk very gracefully, run nimbly, and are capable of bearing great fatigue; though, upon the whole, the men are somewhat inferior, in point of strength and activity, to the Friendly Islanders, and the women less delicately limbed than those of Otaheiti. Their complexion is rather darker than that of the Otaheitans, and they are not altogether so handsome a people. However, many of both sexes had fine open countenances; and the women, in particular, had good eyes and teeth, and a sweetness and sensibility of the look, which rendered them very engaging. Their hair is of a brownish-black, and neither uniformly straight, like that of the Indian of America, nor uniformly curling, as amongst the African negroes, but varying in this respect like the hair of Europeans. One striking peculiarity in the features of every part of this great nation—I do not remember to have seen anywhere mentioned—which is that, even in the handsomest faces, there is always a fullness of the nostril, without any flatness of the nose, that distinguishes them from Europeans.

"The inhabitants of Kauai are of the middle size, and in general stoutly made. They are neither remarkable for a beautiful shape nor for striking features. Their visage, particularly that of the women, is sometimes round; but others have it long, nor can it justly be said that they are distinguished, as a nation, by any general cast of countenance. Their complexion is nearly of a nut-brown color; but some individuals are of a darker hue. We have already mentioned the women as being little more delicate than the men in their formation; and we may add, that with few exceptions, they have little claim to those peculiarities that distinguish the sex in most other parts of the world. There is, indeed, a very remarkable equality in the size, color, and figure of the natives of both sexes; upon the whole, however, they are far from being ugly, and have to all appearances few natural deformities of any kind. Their skin is not very soft, but their eyes and teeth are for the most part pretty good. Their hair, in general, is straight; and though its natural color is black, they stain it, as at the Friendly and other islands. We perceived but few instances of corpulence, and these more frequently among the women than the men; but it was principally among the latter that personal defects were observed, though if any of them can lay claims to a share of beauty it appeared to be more conspicuous amongst the young men.

"They are active, vigorous, and most expert swimmers, leaving their canoes upon the most frivolous occasion, diving under them and swimming to others, though at a considerable distance. We have frequently seen women with infants at their breasts, when the surf was so high as to prevent their landing in the canoes, leap overboard and swim to the shore without endangering the little ones.

"They appear to be of a frank and cheerful disposition, and are equally free from the fickle levity which characterizes the inhabitants of Tahiti, and the sedate pose which is observed among those of Tongatabu. They seem to cultivate a sociable intercourse with each other; and except the propensity to thieving, which is as it were, innate in most of the people we have visited in these seas, they are extremely friendly to us. And it does no small credit to their sensibility, without flattering ourselves, that when they saw the different articles of our European manufacture they could not refrain from expressing their astonishment by a mixture of joy and concern that seemed to apply the case as a lesson of humility to ourselves; and on every occasion they appeared to have a proper consciousness of their own inferiority; a behavior that equally exempts their natural character from the ridiculous pride of the more polished * * * or of the ruder natives. * * *

"The inhabitants of these islands differ from those of the Friendly Islands in suffering almost universally their beards to grow. There were, indeed, a few, amongst whom was the old King, that cut it off entirely, and others that wore it upon the upper lip. One peculiar fashion though, they sometimes cut it close on each side of their head to the ears."

* * * * * * *

"The same superiority which is observed in the persons of the Aliis through the other islands is found also here. Those whom we saw were, without exception, perfectly well formed, whereas the lower sort, besides their general inferiority, are subject to all the variety of make and figure that is seen in the populace of other countries. Instances of deformities are more frequent here than in any of the other islands. While we were cruising off Hawaii two dwarfs came on board, one an old man 4 feet 2 inches high, but exactly proportioned, and the other a woman, nearly of the same height. We afterwards saw three natives, who were humpbacked, and a young man, born without hands or feet. Squinting is also very common among them; and a man, who they said had been born blind, was brought to us to be cured. Besides these particular imperfections they are in general very subject to boils and ulcers, which we attributed to the great quantity of salt which they eat with their flesh and fish. The Aliis are very free from these complaints."

* * * * * * *

"The chiefs exercise their power over one another in the most haughty and oppressive manner * * *."

"The people of these islands are manifestly divided into three classes; the first are the Aliis, or chiefs, of each district, one of whom is superior to the rest, and is called at Hawaii Alii—Taboo and Alii Moi. By the first of these words they express his absolute authority, and by the latter all are obliged to prostrate themselves (or put themselves to sleep, as the word signifies) in his presence. The second class are those who appear to enjoy a right of property without authority. The third class are the Towtows, or servants, who have neither rank nor property."

CHARACTER

"None of the inhabitants we ever met with before in any other island or country were so astonished as these people were upon entering a ship. Their eyes were incessantly roving from one object to another, and the wildness of their looks and features fully indicated their ignorance with respect to everything they saw, and strongly marked to us that they had never, until the present time, been visited by Europeans nor been acquainted with any of our commodities except iron."

They called iron koi or hamaiti, and "on asking them what iron was they immediately answered 'we do not know; you know what it is, and we only understand it as koi or hamaiti.'"

* * * * * * *

"They were in some respects naturally well bred, or at least fearful of giving offense, asking whether they should sit down, whether they might spit on the deck, etc., * * * at first they endeavored to steal everything or later to take it openly * * *."

* * * * * * *

"We met with less reserve and suspicion in our intercourse with the people of this island than we had ever experienced among any other tribe of savages. They frequently sent up into the ship the articles they meant to barter, and afterwards came in themselves to traffic on the quarter deck."

* * * * * * *

The Tahitians, whom we have so often visited, have not that confidence in our integrity. "Whence it may be inferred that those of Hawaii are more faithful in their dealings with each other * * *."

"It is but justice to observe that they never attempted to overreach us in exchanges nor to commit a single theft."

"* * * rather than dispose of them at an undervalue, would carry them to shore again."

"A large village is situated on this point (South Point of Hawaii), many of whose inhabitants thronged off to the ship with hogs and women."

* * * * * * *

"These people merited our best commendations in their commercial intercourse, never once attempting to cheat us, whether ashore or alongside the ships." At first "* * * they thought, that they had a right to everything they could lay their hands upon; but they soon laid aside a conduct which we convinced them they could not persevere in with impunity."

Speaking of the guides that accompanied one of the ship's parties into the interior to obtain timber for repairs, "they bestowed high commendations on their guides, who not only supplied them with provisions but faithfully protected their tools."

* * * * * * *

"* * * they rise with the sun, and after enjoying the cool of the evening retire to rest a few hours after sunset. The making of canoes and nets forms the occupation of the Alits; the women are employed in manufacturing cloth, and the Towtows are principally engaged in the plantations and fishing."

"* * * notwithstanding the irreparable loss we suffered from the sudden resentment and violence of these peoples, yet in justice to their general conduct it must be acknowledged that they are of the most mild and affectionate disposition, equally remote from the extreme levity and the fickleness of the Tahitians and the distant gravity and reserve of the inhabitants of the Friendly Islands. They appear to live in the utmost harmony and friendship with one another."

During certain parleys a chief came off and told us from the King "* * * that the body was carried up the country, but it should be brought to us the next morning. There appeared a great deal of sincerity in his manner, and being asked if he told a falsehood he locked his two forefingers together, which is understood amongst these islands as the sign of truth, in the use of which they are very scrupulous."

"Their natural capacity seems in no respect below the common standard of mankind." * * * "The eager curiosity with which they attended the armorers and the many expedients they had invented, even before we left the islands, for working iron they had procured from us into such forms as were best adapted to their purposes were strong proofs of docility and ingenuity."

TREATMENT OF WOMEN

"It must, however, be observed that they fall very short of the other islanders in that best test of civilization, the respect paid to their women. Here they are not only deprived of the privileges of eating with the men but the best sort of food is tabooed or forbidden them. They are not allowed to eat pork, turtle, several kinds of fish, and some species of the plantains; and we are told that a poor girl got a terrible beating for having eaten on board our ship, one of these interdicted articles. In their domestic life they appear to live almost by themselves, and though we did not observe any instance of personal ill treatment, yet it was evident they had little regard or attention paid them."

* * * * * * *

"The young women were no less kind and engaging; and till they found, notwithstanding our utmost endeavors to prevent it, that they had reason to repent of our acquaintance, attached themselves to us without the least reserve."

"In justice, however, to the sex, it must be observed that these ladies were probably all of the lower class of the people; for I am strongly inclined to believe that, excepting the few whose names are mentioned in the course of our narratives, we did not see any women of rank during our stay amongst them."

CARE OF CHILDREN

"It was pleasing to observe with what affection the women managed their infants, and with what alacrity the men contributed their assistance in such a tender office; thus distinguishing themselves from those savages who consider a wife and child as things rather necessary than desirable or worthy of their regard and esteem."

"The women who had children were remarkable for their tender and constant attention to them, and the men would often lend their assistance in those domestic offices with a willingness that does credit to their feelings."

HOSPITALITY

"He experienced great kindness and civility from the inhabitants in general, but the friendship shown by the priests was constant and unbounded."

At Kealakekua the "party on shore were daily supplied by them (priests) with hogs and vegetables, sufficient for our subsistence, and to spare; and canoes laden with provisions were as regularly sent off to the ships. Nothing was demanded in return, nor was the most distant hint ever given that any compensation was expected." * * * "we had, indeed, less reason to be satisfied with the behavior of the warrior chiefs than with that of the priests. In our intercourse with the former they were always sufficiently attentive to their own interests; * * * the priest who supplied the excursion party with everything is spoken of as follows: "His conduct on this occasion was so delicate and disinterested that even the people he employed were not permitted to accept of the smallest present."

"The great hospitality and kindness with which we were received by them has been already frequently remarked. The old people never failed to receive us with tears of joy; seemed highly gratified with being allowed to touch us, and were constantly making comparison as between themselves and us, with the strongest marks of humility."

GRATITUDE

After Captain Cook's death, and in the fighting that followed, several of the natives were shot in making their escape from the flames; and our people cut off the heads of two of them and brought them on board, and * * * at this time an elderly man was taken prisoner, bound, and sent on board in the same boat with the heads of his two countrymen. I never saw horror so strongly pictured as in the face of this man, nor so violent a transition to extravagant joy as when he was untied and told he might go away in safety. "He showed us he did not lack gratitude, as he frequently afterwards returned with presents of provisions and also did us other services."

GREETINGS

It is not improbable that this [fullness of the nose] may be the effect of their usual mode of saluting, "which is performed by pressing the ends of their noses together."

CEREMONIES

When Captain Cook first landed, "the very instant he stepped on shore the collective body of the natives fell flat on their faces, and remained in that very humble posture till by expressive signs I prevailed upon them to rise; they then brought a great many small pigs, which they presented me with plantain trees * * *."

"The 4th of February being fixed for our departure, Kalaniopuu invited Captain Cook and Mr. King to attend him on the 3d at Kaoo's residence. On our arrival there we saw large quantities of cloth scattered on the ground; abundance of red and yellow feathers fastened to the fibers of coconut husks; and plenty of hatchets and ironware, which had been received from us in barter. Not far from these was deposited an immense quantity of various kinds of vegetables, and at a little distance a large herd of hogs. We supposed at first that the whole was intended as a present for us, but we were informed by Kaireakeea that it was a tribute to the King from the inhabitants of that district. And we were no sooner seated than the bundles were brought and laid severally at Kaireakeea's feet, and the cloth, feathers, and iron were displayed before him. The King was perfectly satisfied with this mark of duty from his people, and selected about a third of the iron utensils, all of the feathers, and some pieces of cloth; he ordered them to be set aside by themselves, and the remainder of the cloth, hogs, vegetables, etc., were afterwards presented to Captain Cook and Mr. King. The value and magnitude of this present far exceeded anything that we had met with."

"Between 10 and 11 o'clock we saw a great number of people descending the hill which is over the beach in a kind of procession, each man carrying a sugar cane or two on his shoulders and breadfruit, taro, and plantains in his hand. They were preceded by two drummers, who, when they came to the waterside, sat down by a white flag and began to beat their drums, while those who had followed them advanced one by one and deposited the presents they had brought and retired in the same order. Soon after Eappo came in sight, in his long feather cloak, bearing something with great solemnity in his hands, and having placed himself on a rock, made signs for a boat to be sent him. Captain Clarke, conjecturing that he had brought the bones of Captain Cook, which proved to be the fact, went himself in the pinnace to receive them, and ordered me to attend him in the cutter. When we arrived at the beach Eappo came into the pinnace and delivered to the captain the bones, wrapped in a large quantity of fine new cloth and covered in a spotted cloak of black and white feathers. He afterwards attended us to the Resolution, but could not be prevailed upon to go on board, probably not choosing, from a sense of decency, to be present at the opening of the bundle."

FIGHTING

"Throughout all this group of islands, the villages for the most part are situated near the sea; and the adjacent ground is inclosed with stone walls about 3 feet high. These, we at first imagined, were intended for the division of property; but we now discovered that they served, probably were principally designed, for a defense against invasion. They consist of loose stone, and the inhabitants are very dexterous in shifting them, with great quickness, to such situations as the direction of the attack may require. In the sides of the mountain, which hangs over the bay, they have little holes or caves, of considerable depth, the entrance of which is secured by a fence of the same kind. From behind both these defenses the natives kept perpetually harassing our waterers with stones; * * *."

"* * * and the men were soon clad in their mats, and armed with spears and stones. One of the natives having provided himself with a stone and a long iron spike, advanced toward the captain flourishing his weapon in defiance and threatening to throw the stone. The captain requested him to desist; but the islander repeating his menace, he was highly provoked and fired a load of small shot at him. The man was shielded in his war mat, which the shot could not penetrate; his firing, therefore, served only to irritate and encourage them. Volleys of stones were thrown at the marines; and one of the Alits attempted the life of Mr. Phillips with his pahoa dagger; by not succeeding in the attempt, he received a blow from him with the butt end of his piece. Captain Cook immediately discharged his second barrel loaded with ball and killed one of the most violent of the assailants. A general attack with stones succeeded * * *. The natives, to our great astonishment, received our fire, with great firmness; and without giving time for the marines to charge again, they rushed in upon them with dreadful shouts and yells * * *."

"After the fighting * * * a small boat, manned by five of our midshipmen, pulled toward the shore where they saw the bodies without any signs of life, lying on the ground; but judging it dangerous * * * they returned to the ships, leaving them in possession of the islanders."

"* * * the men put on their war mats and armed themselves with long spears and daggers. We also observed that since morning, they had thrown up stone breastworks along the beach where Captain Cook had landed; * * * but as soon as we were in reach they began to throw stones at us with slings * * *."

"The bravery of one of these assailants well deserves to be mentioned. For, having returned to carry off his companion amidst the fire of our whole party, a wound which he received made him quit the body and retire; but in a few minutes he again appeared, but again wounded, he was obliged to retreat. At this moment I arrived at the Morae, and saw him return there the third time, bleeding and faint; and being informed of what had happened I forbade the soldiers to fire, and he was suffered to carry off his friend; which he was just able to perform, and then fell down himself and expired."

FLAG OF TRUCE

"* * * And went on with a small boat alone, with a white flag in my hand, which, by a general cry of joy from the natives, I had the satisfaction to find was instantly understood. The women immediately returned from the side of the hill, whither they had retired; the men threw off their mats, and all sat down together by the water side, extending their arms and inviting me to come on shore."

RELIGION

"The religion of these people resembles in most of its features that of the Society and Friendly Islands. * * * Their religious notions are derived from the same source."

"In a bay to the southward of Kealakekua a party of our gentlemen were conducted to a large house, in which they found the black figure of a man, resting on his fingers and toes, with his hand inclined backward, the limbs well formed and exactly proportioned, and the whole beautifully polished. This figure the natives called Maee, and round it were placed 13 others of rude and distorted shapes, which they said were the akuas of several deceased chiefs whose names they recounted. * * * They likewise gave a place in their houses to many ludicrous and some obscene idols like the Praipus of the ancients."

"The temples, idols, sacrifices, and sacred songs all were found similar to those of the Society and Friendly Islands. As to the taboo, the word 'taboo' implies laying restraint upon persons and things. Thus, they say the natives were tabooed, or the bay was tabooed, and so of the rest. This word is also used to express anything sacred or eminent or devoted. Thus the King of Owyhee was Alii Taboo, a human victim—Kanaka Taboo. * * * The women are said to be taboo when they are forbidden to eat certain kinds of meat."

VILLAGES

"Throughout all this group of islands the villages for the most part are situated near the sea, and the adjacent ground is inclosed with stone walls about 3 feet high."

"We passed several villages, some situated near the sea and others farther up country. * * * We saw no wood, but what was up in the interior, except a few trees about the villages, near which we could observe banana plantations and sugar-cane and spots that seemed cultivated for roots."

HOUSES

"The houses are scattered about without the least order. No fortifications. Some are large and commodious, from 40 to 50 feet in length and 20 or 30 feet in breadth. * * * They are well thatched with long grass, which is laid on slender poles. Their figure resembles that of hay stacks. * * * "The entrance is either made in the end or side, and is an oblong hole, extremely low; it is often shut up by a board of planks * * * which serves as a door. * * * No light enters the house except by this opening; and though such close habitations may be a comfortable place for retreat in bad weather, they seem ill adapted to the warm climate of the country. They are kept remarkably clean, and the floors are strewn with dried grass over which mats are spread to sit and sleep on." "* * * The method of living among these people was decent and cleanly." "They had an opportunity of observing the method of living amongst the natives, and it appeared to be decent and cleanly."

ANIMALS

"The only tame or domestic animals that could be found were hogs, dogs, and fowls, which were of the same kind we [illegible] at all the islands of the south Pacific."

"There were also small lizards and some rats, resembling those of every island which we had hitherto visited. The quadrupeds are confined to three sorts—dogs, hogs, and rats. The dogs are of the same species with those of Otaheiti, having short, crooked legs, long backs, and pricked ears. I did not observe any variety in them, except in their skins; some having long and rough hair, and others being quite smooth. They are about the size of a common turnspit; exceedingly sluggish, though perhaps this may be more owing to the manner in which they are treated than to any natural disposition. They are in general fed and left to herd with the hogs; for I do not recollect any instance in which a dog was made a companion in the manner we do in Europe. Indeed, however, the custom of eating them is an insuperable bar to their admission into society. * * * The number of dogs in these islands do not appear to be nearly equal in proportion to those in Otaheiti. But on the other hand, they abound much more in hogs; and the breed is of a larger and weightier kind."

"The birds of these islands are as beautiful as any we have seen during the voyage and are numerous, though not various." The report speaks of a large white pigeon.

"* * * fish and other products of the sea were, to appearance, not various."

FOOD

"The food of the lower class of people consists principally of fish and vegetables; such as yams, sweet potatoes, taro, plantains, sugar-cane, and bread fruit. To these the people of the higher rank add the flesh of hogs and dogs, dressed in the same manner as at the Society Islands. They also eat fowls of the same domestic kind with ours, but they are neither plentiful nor much esteemed by them. Their fish they salt and preserve in gourd shells, not as we at first imagined for the purpose of providing against any temporary scarcity but for the preference they give to salted meats—for we also found that the Aliis used to pickle pieces of pork in the same manner and esteemed it a great delicacy."

"Of animal food they appeared to be in no great want, as they have great numbers of hogs which run without restraint about the houses, 'and if they eat dogs, which is not altogether improbable, their stock of these deemed very considerable.' The quantities of fishing hooks found among them indicated that they procure a tolerable supply of animal food from the sea."

"They bake their vegetables with heated stones; '* * * and from the quantity which we saw dressed at one time we imagined that all the inhabitants of the village, or at least a considerable number of people, joined in the use of a common oven.' * * * 'The only artificial dish we saw was a taro pudding which, though very sour, was devoured with avidity by the natives.' "

"They eat off a sort of wooden trencher, and, as far as we are enabled to judge from one instance, the women, if restrained from feeding at the same dish with the men, as is the custom at Tahiti, are at least allowed to eat in the same place near them.

"They are exceedingly cleanly at their meals, and their mode of dressing both their animal and vegetable foods was universally allowed to be greatly superior to ours. The chiefs constantly began their meals with a dose of the extract of pepper root. The women eat apart from the men and are tabooed or forbidden, as has already been mentioned, the use of pork, turtle, and particular kinds of plantains."

AWA

Bad effect amongst the Aliis was noticed from the use of awa.

"* * * by many of them still more dreadful effects from the immoderate use of the awa. Those who were the most affected by it had their bodies covered with a white scurf, their eyes red and inflamed, their limbs emaciated, the whole frame trembling and paralytic, accompanied with a disability to raise the head. Though this drug does not appear universally to shorten life, as was evident from the cases of Terreeaboo, Kaoo, and some other chiefs, who were very old men, yet it invariably brings on an early and decrepit old age. It is fortunate that the use of it is one of the peculiar privileges of the chiefs. The young son of Terreeaboo, who was about 12 years old, used to boast of his being admitted to drink awa, and showed us in great triumph a small spot on his side that was growing scaly."

"There is something very singular in the history of this pernicious drug. When Captain Cook first visited the Society Islands it was very little known among them. On his second voyage he found the use of it very prevalent at Ulietea; * * * At Kauai also it is used with great moderation and the chiefs are in consequence a much finer set of men there than in any of the neighboring islands. Our good friends, Kaireekeea and old Kaoo, were persuaded by us to refrain from it; and they recovered amazingly during the short time we afterwards remained in the islands."

ARTS

"In the different manufactures of these people there appears to be an extraordinary degree of ingenuity and neatness. The texture of Kapa is inferior to that of Tongatabu or Tahiti, but in coloring or staining it the inhabitants of Kauai displayed a superiority of taste * * *."

"Their colors, indeed, are not very bright, except the red; but the regularity of the figures and stripes is amazing; * * * pieces are generally 2 by 4 or 5 yards in length, some of them are sewed together. Mats are fabricated with designs. Mats * * * occasionally make a part of their dress; for, when they offered them to sell, they put them on their backs."

Dishes are made of the Kou trees, extremely neat and well polished. Their fans are made of wicker work. Fishing hooks are ingeniously made, some of bone, many of pearl shell, and others of wood, pointed with bone. "The elegant form and polish of which (fishhooks) could not be exceeded by any European artist."

"They polish their stones by constant friction with pumice stone in water; * * *." Their adzes were like those of the Society Islands. They have also small instruments composed of a single shark's tooth fixed to the forepart of a dog's jawbone or to a wooden handle.

The business of painting tapa belongs entirely to the women.

Their mats, whether we regard the strength, fineness, or beauty, they certainly excel the world.

Their fishing hooks * * * we found them, upon trial, much superior to our own.

"The gourds which grow to so enormous a size that some of them are capable of containing from 10 to 12 gallons are applied to all manner of domestic purposes; and in order to fit them the better to their respective uses, they have the ingenuity to give them different forms by tying bandages around them during their growth. Thus some of them are of a long cylindrical form as best adapted to contain their fishing tackle; provisions, their puddings, vegetables, etc., which two sorts have neat, close covers, made likewise of the gourd; others again are exactly the shape of a bottle with a long neck, and in these they keep their water. They have likewise a method of scoring them in a heated instrument so as to give them the appearance of being painted in a variety of neat and elegant forms."

DRESS

"The dress of the men consists only of a piece of thick cloth called the malo, about 10 or 12 inches broad, which they pass between the legs and tie around the waist. This is the common dress of all ranks of people. Their mats, some of which are beautifully manufactured, are of various sizes, but mostly about 5 feet long and 4 feet broad. These they throw over their shoulders and bring forward before; but they are seldom used except in time of war, for which purpose they seem better adapted than for ordinary use, being of a thick and cumbersome texture and capable of breaking the blow of a stone or any blunt weapon. Their feet are generally bare, except when they have occasion to travel over the burnt stones, when they secure them with a sort of sandal made of cords twisted from the fibers of the coconut. Such is the ordinary dress of these islanders; but they have another appropriate for their chiefs and used on ceremonious occasions, consisting of a feather cloak and helmet, which, in point of beauty and magnificence, is perhaps equal to that of any nation in the world. Their cloaks are made of different lengths in proportion to the rank of the wearer, some of them reaching no lower than the middle, others trailing on the ground. The inferior chiefs wear also a short cloak resembling the former, made of the long tail feathers of the cock, the tropic and man-of-war birds, with a broad border of the small red and yellow feathers and a collar of the same."

"These feathered dresses seemed to be exceedingly scarce, being appropriated to persons of the highest rank, and worn by the men only."

"The common dress of the women bears a close resemblance of that of the men. They wrap round the waist a piece of cloth that reaches half way down the thigh, and sometimes in the course of the evening they appeared with loose pieces of fine cloth thrown over their shoulders like the women of Otaheiti. The Pa'u is another dress frequently worn by the younger part of the sex. It is made of the thinnest and finest sort of cloth wrapped several times round the waist and descending to the legs so as to have the appearance of a full short petticoat." Speaking of the feather capes, they say, "* * * even in countries where dress is more particular, might be recognized elegant." They are compared with the thickest and richest velvet. The natives would not at first part with them for anything we offered, asking no less a price than a musket. However, some were afterwards purchased for very large nails.

ORNAMENTS

"Both sexes wear necklaces made of strings of small variegated shells; and an ornament in the form of a handle of a cup, about two inches long and one-half inch broad, made of wood, stone, or ivory, finely polished, which is hung about the hair with fine threads of twisted hair, doubled sometimes a hundredfold. Instead of this ornament some of them wear on their breast a small human figure made of bone suspended in the same manner."

"Their necklaces are made of shells, or of a hard, shining red berry. Besides which they wear wreaths of dried flowers of the India Mallows, another beautiful ornament called the lei, which is generally put about the neck, but is sometimes tied like a garland around the hair, and sometimes worn in both these ways at once. It is a ruff of the thickness of the finger, made in a curious manner of exceedingly small feathers, woven so close together as to form a surface as smooth as that of the richest velvet. The ground was generally of a red color with alternate circles of green, yellow, and black."

"At Kauai some of the women wore little figures of the turtle, neatly formed of wood or ivory, tied on their fingers in the manner we wear rings."

MUSIC

"Their music is of a rude kind, having neither figures nor reeds nor instruments of any other sort that we saw, except drums of various sizes. But their songs, which they sung in parts, and accompanied with a gentle motion of the arms in the same manner as the Friendly Islander, had a very pleasing effect."

GAMES

"They have a game much like our draughts * * * it is much more intricate.

"Besides these games, they frequently amuse themselves with racing matches between the boys and girls; and here again they wager with great spirit."

"Swimming is not only a necessary art, in which both the men and women are more expert than any people we had hitherto seen, but a favorite diversion amongst them * * *. The surf, which breaks on the coast along the bay, extends to the distance of about 150 yards from the shore, within which space the surges of the sea, accumulating from the shallowness of the water, are dashed against the beach with prodigious violence. Whenever * * * the surf is increased into its utmost height, they choose that time for this amusement, which is performed in the following manner: 20 or 30 of the natives, taking each a narrow board rounded at the ends, set out together from the shore. * * * As soon as they have gained by these repeated efforts the smooth water beyond the surf they lay themselves at length on their board and prepare for their return. As the surf consists of a number of waves, of which every third is remarked to be always much larger than the others and to flow higher on shore, the rest breaking in the intermediate space, their object is to place themselves on the summit of the largest surf, by which they are driven along with amazing rapidity toward the shore * * *. Those who succeed in their object of reaching the shore have still the greatest danger to encounter. The coast being guarded by a chain of rocks, with here and there a small opening between them, they are obliged to steer their boards through one of these, or, in case of failure, to quit it before they reach the rocks, and, plunging under the waves, make the best of it back again * * *. The boldness and address with which we saw them perform these difficult and dangerous maneuvers was altogether astonishing and is scarcely to be credited."

TATTOOING

"The custom of tattooing the body they have in common with the rest of the natives of the South Sea Islands; but it is only at New Zealand and the Sandwich Islands that they tattoo the face. They have a peculiar custom amongst them, the meaning of which we could never learn, that of tattooing the tip of the tongues of the females."

CANOES

All canoes were about 24 feet long, the bottom of a single piece, hollowed out to the thickness of an inch or more, pointed at each end. They seldom exceed a foot and a half in breadth. Those that go single have outriggers which are shaped and fitted with more judgment than any we had before seen. Some are double. Some use a triangular sail, extended to a mast and boom. The ropes are strong and neatly made.

SOME QUESTIONS WITH RESPECT TO CANNIBALISM

"We first tried by many indirect questions, put to each of them apart, to learn in what manner the rest of the bodies had been disposed of, and finding them very constant in one story—that after the flesh had been cut off it was all burned—we at last put the direct question whether they had not eaten some of it. They immediately showed as much horror at the idea as any European would have done, and asked, very naturally, if that was the custom amongst us?"

"These two circumstances considered, it was extremely difficult to draw any certain conclusion from the actions of a people with whose language and customs we were so imperfectly acquainted."

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER].

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, quite recently I had occasion to address the committee upon the transportation conditions throughout the country, ultimately for the purpose of considering the adequacy of the machinery essential to administration. It is my purpose to approach the consideration of this question with that degree of deliberation essential to the development of constructive relief. Interruptions are invited from any member of the committee which are of a helpful character and which have for their purpose that degree of assistance and constructive thought which the conditions require.

In that brief presentation I called attention to the inadequacy of the machinery of the commission by quoting the criticism of the President of the United States.

As a background for the criticism of the people of the United States we cite the demands of the various organizations representing them.

The Joint Congressional Commission on Agricultural Inquiry in 1921 said:

The transportation rates on many commodities, more especially the products of agriculture, bear a disproportionate relation to the prices of such commodities; there should be immediate reductions in transportation rates applied to farm products and other basic commodities; greater consideration should be given in the future by public rate-making authorities and by the railroads in making of transportation rates to the relative value of commodities and existing and prospective economic conditions. The pyramided per cent advances in rates which have been authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission or made by the United States Railroad Administration caused the dislocation of long-standing relationships between rates upon agricultural and industrial products, between competitive enterprises and competitive sections of the country.

The United States Chamber of Commerce, November 14, 1923, after lengthy investigation, reported:

It can not be claimed that the railroad freight-rate structure of the United States has ever been organized on a scientific basis, or that it has ever been systematically revised with the purpose of eliminating disparities. The great economic changes incident to and resulting from the war have created additional disparities resulting from horizontal rate changes, from the dislocation of relative price levels, and from increases in labor costs and terminal expenses which have borne with greater weight on some classes of traffic than others. This situation renders a readjustment of relative freight rates of great immediate importance.

The preliminary report of the agricultural conference, January 28, 1925, states:

By reason of the horizontal changes in freight rates during recent years and of greater depression of agricultural products than those of other products during the same period, the raw products of agriculture are now bearing a relatively excessive cost for transportation. * * * The conference does wish to emphasize at this time its conviction that while adequate service is essential, the welfare of agriculture also demands an early and thorough revision of the freight-rate structure to relieve the raw products of agriculture and livestock from their disproportionate share of transportation costs.

In his message of December, 1923, President Coolidge said:

Competent authorities now agree that an entire reorganization of the rate structure for freight is necessary. This should be ordered at once by the Congress.

In speaking of agriculture, he said:

Indirectly the farmer must be relieved by a reduction of national and local taxation. He must be assisted by the reorganization of the freight-rate structure, which could reduce charges on his production.

In his testimony before the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on the effect of the horizontal increases in dislocating the rate structure and increasing the burdens upon the basic farm products, Commissioner Esch, then chairman of the commission, said:

Horizontal increases resulted in maladjustments because the same percentage of increase applied to the low as well as to the high-priced articles, and the lower-priced articles were less able to sustain that increase than were the high-priced articles. * * * I think that these maladjustments due to horizontal increases have been mitigated to the extent of the 10 per cent horizontal reduction which was made July 1, 1922.

From the very inception of these demands for a reorganization of the rate structure the commission was clothed with initiatory power to revise and readjust rates on its own motion. In fact, Congress made it mandatory on the commission to relieve the commerce of such inequitable conditions.

Section 15 (1) as amended by the transportation act of 1920 provides:

That whenever, after full hearing, upon a complaint made as provided in section 13 of this act, or after full hearing under an order for investigation and hearing made by the commission on its own initiative, either in extension of any pending complaint or without any complaint whatever, the commission shall be of opinion that any individual or joint rate, fare, or charge whatsoever demanded, charged, or collected by any common carrier or carriers subject to this act for the transportation of persons or property or for the transmission of messages as defined in the first section of this act, or that any individual or joint classification, regulation, or practice whatsoever of such carrier or carriers subject to the provisions of this act, is or will be unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act, the commission is hereby authorized and empowered to determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable individual or joint rate, fare, or charge, or rates, fares, or charges, to be thereafter observed in such case, or the maximum or minimum, or maximum and minimum, to be charged—

And so forth. Paragraph 3 of the same section provides:

The commission may, and it shall whenever deemed by it necessary or desirable in the public interest, after full hearing upon complaint or upon its own initiative without a complaint, establish through routes, joint classifications, and joint rates, fares, or charges, applicable to the transportation of passengers or property, or the maxima or minima, or maxima and minima, to be charged (or, in the case of a through route where one of the carriers is a water line, the maximum rates, fares, and charges applicable thereto), and the divisions of such rates, fares, or charges as hereinafter provided, and the terms and conditions under which such through routes shall be operated; and this provision, except as herein otherwise provided, shall apply when one of the carriers is a water line.

Paragraph 2 of section 15 A provides:

In the exercise of its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates the commission shall initiate, modify, establish, or adjust such rates so that carriers as a whole (or as a whole in each of such rate groups or territories as the commission may from time to time designate) will, under honest, efficient, and economical management and reasonable expenditures for maintenance of way, structures, and equipment, earn an aggregate annual net railway operating income equal, as nearly as may be, to a fair return upon the aggregate value of the railway property of such carriers held for and used in the service of transportation.

Thus we see that the failure and neglect of the commission to act was not caused by a lack of authority or the neglect of Congress. In fact, Congress said that the commission "shall initiate, modify, establish, or adjust such rates." Yet in the face of repeated demands it failed to act. Its failure became so marked that President Coolidge, in his message to Congress in 1923, said:

Competent authorities now agree that an entire reorganization of the rate structure for freight is necessary. This should be ordered at once by the Congress.

In his message of 1924 he said:

Indirectly the farmer must be relieved by a reduction of national and local taxation. He must be assisted by the reorganization of the freight rate structure, which could reduce charges on his production.

Its continued neglect to act prompted Congress to enact an additional mandate to the commission in 1925 as an emergency measure to reduce the charges against farm products and relieve agriculture. At that time the farmers of the country were in sore and desperate straits. They needed every encouragement and assistance possible. The prices of farm products were low and the rates were extremely high, so high as to absorb all the profits from their production. Here was a method of relief approved by all the farm conferences, the national commerce organization, the President of the United States, and the Congress. And yet more than four years have elapsed without any compliance with the demands of the country and the Congress. It shows such an imperviousness to public sentiment and the imperative needs of agriculture as to prompt the inquiry at once as to its competency to administer.

It is an independent commission. It has no driving head. It is lacking in systematic organization essential to concentration and driving power sufficient to get results. The annual election of a president for one year only, in order that the honor may be passed around among its membership, completely divests it of a driving force at the head essential to the adoption of a policy and the concentration of organized systematic effort for the administration essential for the equitable apportionment of the charges against commerce. Centralized here in Washington, its members move and live and have their being in a railroad atmosphere. Railroad lawyers are constantly before it with their contentions and their arguments and representations. The voice of the country is seldom heard. The breath of the country atmosphere rarely permeates it. Instead of acting as an administrative body for the people, to administer for the people as Congress created it, it now acts as a court, assumes a judicial attitude, and requires the unorganized public to bring cases to it for its disposition.

Confirmatory of this attitude is the testimony given before the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee by W. V. Hardie, Director of the Bureau of Traffic of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who has been such since the organization of the bureau in 1920. In reply to an inquiry as to what an investigation of the rate structure would reveal, he said:

Well, there are, of course, a great many maladjustments of rates as between points. I consider those of much more importance than those between commodities. For example, you will find such discrepancies as one fellow paying 50 per cent more for the same service right in the same territory. Those have been found in this investigation in southern territory which has just been in progress and where the commission is trying to lay down a new plan of rates there that will remove those discrepancies.

In his testimony before the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, Mr. Hardie said:

Of course, I want to point out that the commission to some extent is, or at least considers itself to be, in the same category as a court. The court may know of a great many evils and things that are extant, but it, to a large measure, considers those that are brought before it in the form of suits, and to a considerable extent that is the way the commission has felt that Congress intended it to function under the interstate commerce act—that anybody who felt that the rates were unreasonable or otherwise in violation of that law was given a court to come to and present his troubles and try to have them corrected, and the commission has been dealing with approximately 1,100 formal cases, as well as a great many others that are adjusted through negotiation—that is my specialty to do that—the commission has been dealing with those as people have complained about them, and naturally it has felt, and, I think, with a good deal of justice, that the ones the people complain about are the ones that must be hurting the worst. Those are the ones we have been directing our attention to primarily.

The discussion through interruptions developed great inconsistencies in the rate structure inconceivable, incomprehensible, unexplainable, inexcusable, and indefensible. It was not my purpose to go into the rates at that time, because I thought the evidence was so overwhelming as to the vicious discriminations filling the rate structure that it needed no authority to be cited or evidence to be adduced to show what everyone concedes and the imperative necessity for reorganization. The ultimate purpose of the presentation was to present a plan to create adequate machinery so as to afford one of the major remedies to assist the farmers of this country.

Farm relief involves not less than three major remedies, viz: First, the preservation of our home markets for our home farmers and the exclusion of foreign products; second, the stabilization of prices of farm products through orderly marketing; and third, a reorganization of the freight-rate structure for the purpose of opening the roads not only to our domestic markets but to the markets of the world where our exportable surpluses must be disposed of. In all of the controversy and in all of the discussion of the farm problem during the last four years this phase of the question has not been presented, viz, the relationship of transportation to the sale of our exportable surpluses in the foreign market. How to dispose of the exportable surpluses of the major farm products in the most economical way with the least loss and the greatest profit, and thus protect the domestic price against the depressing influences of the world price is the most important and difficult factor in the solution of what is called the farm problem.

As a major premise for pursuing that investigation you will have to admit, first, that one of the essential steps in the solution of this proposition is open roads to the markets or roads that are as open to our farmers as they are to the farmers of any competitive country. [Applause.] The farmers of the Middle West and Southwest are under this handicap, a handicap or disadvantage of 7.3 per cent per bushel on wheat going into the markets of Liverpool, and all other exportable surpluses are under the same handicap in the same proportion. How can you expect the American farmer to compete with his competitors in Canada, in the Argentine, in Australia, and in India with the disadvantage of 7.3 per cent per bushel greater transportation costs to the world's market?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Has the gentleman comparative figures as to the distance they haul wheat in Canada for the same price that they haul wheat in the United States?

Mr. GARBER. I have such figures, and I will be glad to insert them in the RECORD. The inquiry is very material and pertinent in the consideration of this question and shows the keen appreciation of the gentleman from Oklahoma. The cost of transportation in Canada is at least 50 per cent less than it is in the United States for the same products.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is there any difference in the freight rate as to wheat transported from Canada through the United States as compared with wheat raised in the United States?

Mr. GARBER. The Canadian wheat only finds a market in the United States, practically, for milling-in-bond purposes. Our 42-cent tariff on wheat is sufficient to protect us against Canadian competition.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. All the Canadian wheat that comes into this country is not milled in bond. Much of it goes into domestic flour on account of its high protein content.

Mr. GARBER. Is that after paying the tariff of 42 cents a bushel?

Mr. KNUTSON. I think so.

Mr. GARBER. Then we ought to raise the tariff on wheat. My investigation of the question was not sufficiently in detail to reach that conclusion, but it was sufficient to reach the conclusion that the major portion of Canadian wheat in this country is for milling-in-bond purposes and is then sent on its way to Cuba to take advantage of our preferential market there.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not a fact, if the gentleman will yield further, that Canadian wheat milled in bond in the United States has practically displaced in the Cuban market flour made from American wheat?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; absolutely; in the Cuban market. We have purchased our preferential market in Cuba, how? By giving them a preferential in our market, and the milling in bond of Canadian wheat is taking advantage of our preferential market in Cuba because it is admitted there upon the same terms, and as a consequence, as the gentleman has just said, it is displacing 40,000,000 bushels of wheat annually produced by our farmers which could be sold in the form of flour in our preferential market in Cuba.

How shall we proceed to reduce the cost of transportation so as to put our farmers upon an equality in the Liverpool market with the farmers of Canada, Argentina, Australia, and India for cotton as well as wheat? You members of the committee know just as well as I do there is only one way, and that is to reduce the charges on the transportation of the major farm products.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HASTINGS. Before we get away from this matter of bringing wheat in from Canada and milling it in bond and then exporting it to Cuba, I wonder if the gentleman himself has detailed information as to whether the preferential right to export wheat to Cuba is given to the Canadian wheat milled in bond in the United States?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. That is the interpretation of our treaty and laws by Cuba, and it is being admitted into that market.

Mr. HASTINGS. The general import duty on wheat is 42 cents a bushel, but on wheat milled in bond, what do they pay?

Mr. KNUTSON. Nothing.

Mr. GARBER. Nothing.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then, as I understand, they get around the import duty by bringing it over here and milling it in bond, as you call it, and then exporting it to Cuba?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. If I may interrupt a moment—and Canadian wheat, milled in the United States in bond, goes into Cuba exactly on the same footing as flour made from American wheat.

Mr. HASTINGS. Just one more question. My recollection from looking it up the other day is that we imported about 18,500,000 bushels of wheat from Canada and we exported a little more than 37,000,000 bushels. I want to know if this wheat that is milled in bond is included in this report of the amount imported, namely, a little more than 18,500,000 bushels.

Mr. GARBER. I think not; no.

Mr. HASTINGS. You think it is not included?

Mr. GARBER. I think not.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then the wheat that is milled in bond is in addition?

Mr. GARBER. That is in addition and is separate and apart from that to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. KNUTSON. The 18,000,000 bushels is imported for domestic use on account of its high protein content.

Mr. GARBER. At the request of farm organizations and milling organizations, I introduced a bill to amend our present tariff laws so as to give the producers of wheat in this country our preferential market in Cuba, to which they are entitled and for which we have paid in giving sugar a preferential rate into this country from Cuba.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McKEOWN. The traveling public who have been so much interested in the repeal of the Pullman surcharges, which amount to some $35,000,000 a year, have been told that the reason they can get no relief is because the rates are to be reduced on the products of the farmers. Does the gentleman know anything about that proposition?

Mr. GARBER. I realize and appreciate and recall, since the gentleman has suggested it, that that has been a controversial question in Congress and in the country for several years; and the roads take the position that if they have to reduce the Pullman surcharges they will be unable to reduce rates. Is not that correct?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. I think before I get through with this hurried presentation I will be able to show every member of this committee that the roads in the Middle West and Southwest could easily reduce their rates on farm products more than 7.3 per cent and still enjoy a net per cent exceeding the 5¾ per cent allowed by law; and if I prove to you that the roads would be able to do this, then what objection could anyone have to a reduction of the rates on farm products to the Gulf ports for export in order to put our farmers upon an equality with competing farmers in the markets of the world?

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Following out the statement of the gentleman, is it not a fact that several of the northwestern roads made application to the Interstate Commerce Commission for permission to reduce the rates on farm products and were refused such permission?

Mr. GARBER. I think that is the case in several instances; but, mind you, the rates in Minnesota are the most favorable on farm products of any State in the Union. The rates in the Middle West and the Southwest are 60 per cent higher on farm products than the rates in Minnesota, and they are in the same rate-making district. Give us the Minnesota rates and we will be able to put farm products in Liverpool on an equality with every other country in the world. That is all we are asking for.

Now, in order that we may properly appreciate the importance of the equality of rates to the Liverpool market, I want to read you a short excerpt from a speech delivered by the Secretary of Commerce at that time, now the President elect——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. What is the gentleman's name? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARBER. It seems to me that the results of the late election disclosed a wide acquaintance throughout the country with the President elect. [Applause.]

Here is what he said, and I read it for the purpose of showing the mental grasp that he has on the farm problems and that his analysis is not of a hazy, indefinite, uncertain character.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARBER. I will yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. My colleague has made a startling statement, and I am sure that it must be correct; but I want to emphasize it by asking this question: The gentleman says that the rates on farm products in Minnesota are 60 per cent less per ton-mile for farm products than anywhere throughout the Southwest.

Mr. GARBER. Yes; I made that statement.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I interrupt the gentleman? Is it not a fact that when Minnesota products cross the State line they become interstate and subject to interstate rates? We do not have any better interstate rates than any other section. The gentleman is talking about intrastate rates.

Mr. GARBER. Yes; in Minnesota, for 50 miles, 100 pounds, the rate is 8 cents; Kansas, 10 cents; Oklahoma and Texas, 11 cents. In Minnesota, 100 miles, the scale is 12 cents; Kansas, 13 cents; Oklahoma, 15 cents. In Minnesota, 500 miles, 19½ cents; Oklahoma and Texas, 33 cents.

Mr. JONES. What does the gentleman say the scale is in Texas?

Mr. GARBER. For 500 miles, the Minnesota rate for 100 pounds is 19½ cents; Kansas, 24½ cents; Oklahoma and Texas, 33 cents.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman has given considerable study to the rate question, and I have enjoyed his statement. The question was asked a few minutes ago about this surcharge. Six years ago when we had this matter of repealing the Pullman surcharge up I voted against it, on the ground that if we did not repeal it the freight rates would be reduced. To-day, on a shipment of cattle for a distance of 200 miles the rate is three times what it was 10 years ago. Does the gentleman know of any effort having been made to reduce freight rates since the time that we took up the matter of repealing the surcharge on Pullman fares? The claim was made at that time—and I had petitions from farmers asking that it be not repealed—that if we did not repeal it the freight rates would be reduced. Has there been any effort made to reduce freight rates?

Mr. GARBER. That opens up a big field for discussion.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I have petitions from farmers now coming in asking that we do not repeal the surcharge so that they may get a reduction of freight rates.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. I want to say that I engaged in the argument against the repealing of the surcharge, but it was not on the theory that there would be a reduction of freight rates. It was made on the theory that if we did repeal the surcharge it would increase freight rates.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I take issue with my colleague; I have petitions on my desk saying that if we did not repeal the surcharge that the freight rates would be reduced.

Mr. RAYBURN. I was talking about the argument a few years ago.

Mr. HUDSPETH. That was made at that time to me by farm organizations, and that caused me to change my vote. I intended to vote to repeal it, but I voted against repealing it.

Mr. GARBER. I think it may be fair to state that the argument was used and presented to every Member of the House.

Mr. JONES. I call the gentleman's attention in that connection to the fact that just about that time we passed the so-called Hoch resolution, which directed the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate the question of reducing those rates. The argument was made frequently that we could not expect favorable action on the Hoch resolution to reduce rates on farm products if we repealed the Pullman surcharge.

Mr. GARBER. I think the gentleman is correct, that a fair statement of the proposition is that the argument was used that if we reduced the Pullman surcharge it would at least minimize our chances of securing a reorganization of the rate structure on farm products to such a degree as to almost prevent it.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The gentleman started a while ago to tell us about a bill that he introduced, and the effects of it. Will the gentleman take time now to tell us of that bill and the present status of it?

Mr. GARBER. It was not my purpose to call attention to that measure; but just briefly and hurriedly, in passing, the bill prohibits Canadian or any other imported wheat milled in bond from receiving the preferential duties in Cuba. In other words, it recognizes that our preferential treaty with Cuba was purchased by us through additional cost to all of the consumers of sugar in this country and that we are entitled to that market, our farmers are entitled to it.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman explain the status of his bill and whether there is opportunity to pass it or not?

Mr. GARBER. The bill has been referred to the House Committee on Ways and Means, and from the wide response received throughout the entire West and Southwest I believe that it will receive favorable consideration from the committee at the proper time. When enacted, it will insure to our wheat growers an additional home market for about 40,000,000 bushels of wheat, and that will help solve the problem in farm relief of the exportable surplus. What did the President elect say when he was Secretary of Commerce in regard to the exportable surplus? I read from his speech:

I can possibly make this problem of economic shifts more clear by example. A great part of agriculture which competes with our farmers lies to a considerable degree in Argentina, Australia, eastern Europe, and India. Those agricultural areas are all nearer seaboard and their ocean rates to the common markets remain the same as pre-war, while our rail rates to seaboard on wheat, for instance, have increased about 8 to 18 cents per bushel.

Therefore foreign farmers reach European markets at a less cost in proportion to pre-war than can our mid-west American farmer. In actual figures the competing farmers from the Argentine, for instance, have felt an increase in rates of only 2 cents per bushel.

I believe there is general agreement that the cost of transportation is a deduction from the price the farmer receives at the world's markets—and, besides that, the price at which he realizes his surplus in foreign and seaboard markets makes the price of his whole product at home so that the effect of increased transportation rates to these markets is far greater than the bare amount as applied to exports only.

It is an enormous sum when applied to our crops, and is one of the contributing causes of the farmer's postwar difficulties.

You see the mental grasp of the proposition exhibited by our President elect that it not only has to do with the price of the exportable surplus disposed of but reflects back to the domestic market and depresses the price of the whole crop. That is the proposition, and that is what he lays down in this speech from which I am quoting.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for his thorough knowledge of farm questions and his high ability as a member of this committee. I gladly yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is generally agreed that we are selling our wheat now at the world markets, and will continue to do so as long as we have a surplus. With the completion of the Hudson Bay Railroad, we may look for a further reduction in the world market price for wheat. Does not the gentleman think that the enormous amount of wheat being brought from western Canada nearer to the seaboard will have that effect?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. And the building of the new railroad up there will work further injury on our wheat farmers.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman is right. So that the necessity for a reduction of the charge against farm products becomes imperatively necessary to enable our farmers to sell their surplus products in the world's markets in competition with the increased production.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. From the standpoint of transportation for export, there is not much prospect of any relief to the farmer except through the development of the St. Lawrence waterway, is there?

Mr. GARBER. In view of the interminable and inexcusable delay, almost to the extent of refusing to administer, I am willing to say that the gentleman is right in his suggestion.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Along the line of the suggestion made by the gentleman about the development of the St. Lawrence waterway, does not the gentleman's statement take into the farm-relief matter the development of our inland waterways?

Mr. GARBER. I do; but it is going to take 25 years to materialize on the inland-waterway situation.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I spoke of the St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is right. We favor the program, but it is a long-time one. The farmers have waited now for a period of seven years for a reorganization of the rate structure, which every authority has said was imperative and necessary.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GARBER. I will.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it possible to reduce the rate structure in favor of agriculture without preferential rates?

Mr. GARBER. Yes. I will answer the gentleman's question right now. The reason is this: In 1920 there was imposed upon the commerce of the country horizontal increases on an average of 33⅓ per cent, and those increases fell with crushing effect on farm products, because the major farm products move in carload commodity lots with the long haul, so that the increase was just as great upon a bushel of wheat selling for $1 as it was upon a silk gown selling for $50. That is why we say that the rate structure should be reorganized, that it was dislocated by these horizontal increases which so inequitably increased the transportation burdens against farm products.

Mr. MORGAN. The benefits farmers could receive out of the readjustment of the rate structure will be principally on the export business.

Mr. GARBER. No; not necessarily.

Mr. KNUTSON. On interstate business.

Mr. GARBER. The major benefit of the reduction of the rate upon the export surplus in the Liverpool market to an equality with that of the producers of other countries will be to secure to our farmers the full benefits of protection in the domestic market.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I will.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to ask this question with reference to this very important subject which the gentleman has so well presented this morning.

Mr. GARBER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the attitude of our Interstate Commerce Commission that has cost this Government so many millions of dollars and is considered an important arm of our Government? Can the gentleman give us a little information along that line?

Mr. GARBER. I shall be very glad, indeed, to address myself to the very pertinent question of the gentleman from Illinois. In face of the repeated demands for a reorganization of the rate structure for freight to reduce the charges against farm products, the delay of the commission for a period of six years in affording the farmers such relief can only be construed as an attitude of indifference to their needs. In the five years' delay since President Coolidge called its attention to the necessity of relieving farm products from the burdens of horizontal increases, and since the four years has elapsed since Congress, by special mandate, ordered the commission to act, the lack of administration by the commission, either from its indifference or inadequacy of machinery, clearly appears.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. Carrying the thought expressed by the gentleman from Illinois, is it not a fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has invariably refused the requests made by railroads for a reduction of rates—for instance, coal from the southeastern territory and wheat from the northwestern territory?

Mr. GARBER. That may be true. But you must recognize that the commission must have the right and power to fix minimum rates as well as maximum rates in order to preserve a rate level equitable to every section of the country.

Mr. KNUTSON. The thought is that the commission, on the whole, has not been favorable to the reduction of rates.

Mr. GARBER. It required less than six months to impose the horizontal increases to help the roads; more than six years have elapsed without material reductions to help the farmers.

Mr. MORGAN. Did the gentleman read in the press this morning of waterways as one of the five propositions for legislation which the President elect mentions? Do you agree with him as to the waterways?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; as a material number on a long-time program.

Mr. MORGAN. Waterways as one of the main benefits we will derive from the readjustment of rates? I mean the inland and St. Lawrence waterways.

Mr. GARBER. That is a long-time program for agriculture. We must have assistance in the disposition of the exportable farm surplus now.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. You have in mind a remedy for the present?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; a remedy for the present; and God knows the farmers of this country, after waiting for seven or eight years, are entitled to it. [Applause.]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. I came in late and did not hear all the gentleman's remarks. Has the gentleman dealt with this question of a specific remedy in the readjustment of the rate structure?

Mr. GARBER. I am just about to present such remedy.

Mr. MORGAN. What does the gentleman propose as an immediate means of relief?

Mr. GARBER. The present system is wrong. It is a makeshift. It is exercising legislative power never delegated by Congress. It is not giving the people the quality of service demanded. The examiners may be good fellows, alright, but there is a vast difference between good fellows and good judges.

The system is not representative, responsible, nor efficient in the public interest. It is too slow, tortuous, painful, costly, unwieldy, and cumbersome, trailing along too far behind in its administration to afford relief when needed anywhere, any time during this generation or the next. Its service is of value only to those interested in the preservation of existing conditions. It is doing that work well.

The power to fix rates is equivalent to the power to tax the rail commerce of the country. Rates on commerce determine its flow; they determine the amount of profit or loss to the producer, whether an industry or section of country shall flourish or languish, shall prosper or perish.

With a commission exercising the power to levy this tax, every section of the country is entitled to have its equal representation on its membership. The law should be amended so as—

(a) To require the President in all future appointments to fill vacancies on the commission with due regard for such representation.

(b) To effect a reorganization of the commission. Its administration should be decentralized. Its membership of 11 is too large to act collectively. The commission should redelegate its power to any individual member subject to review on appeal by a division of five members.

(c) To require the commission, through one of its members, to hold annual sessions at convenient places in each of the four group rate-making districts of the country.

With the power of the commission thus delegated and exercised by one of its members, the holding of such annual sessions would provide a convenient tribunal for the hearing of complaints and their prompt disposition for the people of every section of the country. Instead of compelling litigants to come to Washington, it would provide an agency in their midst for their convenience. Such procedure would require a commissioner to hear the evidence in person and supervise the proceedings so as to bring into the record all the evidence of which the case was susceptible. It would provide the process of the elimination of cases through appeal, the same as we now have in civil procedure, and relieve the congestion in the appellate division at Washington. It would more than double the efficiency of the commission. It would be representative and more satisfactory to the people. It would restore their confidence in its sincerity and efficiency. In time it would enable the appellate division to currently administer its duties as the Supreme Court now administers and enjoy in equal degree the confidence, the respect, and appreciation of the country.

Mr. MORGAN. That is outside the realm of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. GARBER. No; it would not be. Commissioner Esch, in his testimony before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, said that the horizontal increases dislocated the rate structure and put the burden on agricultural products. I want to read to you what Secretary Hoover said on that question. Secretary Hoover said, in substance:

It tore our rate structure to pieces.

I read from his testimony, given before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

The net result is that we have entirely torn our rate structure to pieces in this country by virtue of what we have done in the last eight years.

He further says that it is a "hodgepodge." There is no consistency in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. GARBER. I ask for additional time.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. How much more time would the gentleman like to have to complete his argument?

Mr. GARBER. Twenty minutes.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 additional minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. GARBER. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his courtesy.

The rate structure is made up of rates, made by whom? Why, by the railroads in the competitive days when they fixed the rates and took the rebates and the refunds and fixed their preferentials and differentials and their discriminations and exercised such authority so oppressively and arbitrarily that they shocked the people of the country into action which resulted in wresting the control of rate making from the roads. There has never been a reorganization of the rate structure.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Before the gentleman goes into that, I want to ask him a question for information. Can the gentleman, as a member of the committee, tell us why, in the shipment of hogs to market, the hogs shipped by railroad always bring a higher price than the same class of hogs shipped by truck? In the market in Oklahoma City there was 40 cents difference between railroad-hauled and truck-hauled hogs. Why is that?

Mr. GARBER. I would be glad to have the gentleman from Oklahoma give us such information.

Mr. McKEOWN. I do not know why it is, but I know hogs shipped by railroad bring a higher price than those shipped by truck. It is the same with milk. They will pay more for milk shipped in by train than by delivery wagons.

Mr. GARBER. That is probably one of the practices of the market. If it is so, it is to be deplored.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Have you investigated the disadvantages we suffer in the Liverpool market on wheat and flour?

Mr. GARBER. I have. I made the statement here to-day that the mid-west and southwest farmers are at a disadvantage of 7.3 per cent on every bushel of wheat delivered in the Liverpool market, and on every other basic farm commodity in proportion. The roads in the Middle West and Southwest are the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe system; the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy system; Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific system; the St. Louis & San Francisco system; the Missouri, Kansas & Texas system; the Missouri Pacific system; Kansas City Southern system; Midland Valley; Houston & Texas Central; Texas & Brazos Valley; and Kansas City, Mexico & Orient system. Miles operated, 56,488.6.

Now, then, these roads originate farm products in the Middle West and Southwest and carry them to export ports of Galveston and New Orleans.

I will insert a table comparing the Oklahoma, Kansas, and Nebraska rates with the Canadian rates.

Mr. MORGAN. Is that for export?

Mr. GARBER. For export; yes.

It will be observed from this table that the wheat rates to Galveston from 11 points in Nebraska are 192.2 per cent of rates for similar distances in Canada; that the rates charged from 31 representative points in Kansas are 205.9 per cent of rates charged for similar service in Canada; while from 11 representative points in Oklahoma, the rates are 189.2 per cent of the Canadian rates, making an export rate to Liverpool of 31 cents per bushel for wheat. Taking Kansas, for example, the effect of this situation is to make an average rate of 27 plus cents a bushel for the railroad service to Galveston, and the average rate from the Gulf ports to Liverpool or other North European ports is taken as 11 cents.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield.

Mr. BROWNE. Does the gentleman think the lower Canadian rates are caused by the fact that the Canadian National Railroads are owned and operated by the Government, and that those lower rates compelled the Canadian Pacific to lower its rates?

Mr. GARBER. I think so; yes. I think that is true. The Interstate Commerce Commission voluntarily published a brief to show that our roads could not compete with the Canadian roads and the reasons given were, first, because of taxes, second, because of land subsidies, and third, because of less labor costs, all of which were absolutely untenable.

But I have not the time to enter into a discussion of that proposition. I want now to call your attention to these figures. The freight revenue for 1926 on these roads totaled $826,362,834; the operating revenue totaled $1,077,188,914; the net operating revenue was $225,146,036; and the income necessary to give the legal return of 5¾ per cent under the Interstate Commerce Commission's valuation was $187,230,819. The excess income above that fair return on these roads was $38,915,217, or a rate of earning upon the Interstate Commerce Commission's valuation of 6.91 per cent. We export 50,000,000 bushels of wheat from the Mid West and Southwest annually. Reduce the freight rates to the extent of 7.3 per cent per bushel and you have open roads to the Liverpool market, an equality in that market for our own farmers without jeopardy to a net return of 5¾ per cent to the roads.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The Hoch-Smith resolution was passed, I believe, in 1925.

Mr. GARBER. That has been four years ago—but no relief. Now, then, in view of the continued failure to act upon this, the most important question in this country, what conclusion can you reach? I reach the conclusion that it is because of the inefficiency of the commission, probably caused by lack of adequate machinery. The commission is overloaded; its machinery has broken down to the extent that it is inefficient for the purposes for which it was created. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the gentleman have in mind or has he looked into the bill which I introduced on February 5 for the purpose of speeding up the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission? We had in mind, in trying to secure this legislation, relief of congestion at the top in the Interstate Commerce Commission, so as to permit single members or delegated employees to pass on minor cases, so the commission might speed up the work on the big and important decisions that they must render. In the Pacific Northwest we have had hearings, and very extensive hearings, and we are very anxious to get results out there the same as the gentleman is in the Southwest.

Mr. GARBER. Have you not received results in the Northwest?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. We have not.

Mr. GARBER. And the Hoch-Smith resolution passed more than four years ago, and the farm demand having been made as long as seven years ago?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Has the gentleman in mind a Senate bill which proposes to repeal the Hoch-Smith resolution and further gum up the machinery? I think we had better look into that somewhat.

Mr. GARBER. I recall there is such a bill pending.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HASTINGS. What I gather from the very splendid address my colleague has made is that we are not so much in need of additional legislation as we are of a more sympathetic administration and a more expeditious administration of the affairs under the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. GARBER. That is true, but I have reached the conclusion we can not secure that without additional legislation setting up machinery.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman means additional machinery?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; additional machinery and decentralizing the administration that we now have.

In reply to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS] I am going to take up the question of machinery, because I have prolonged this discussion too much now.

The gentleman's suggestion includes this inquiry: Would I favor a delegation of power to employees? Is not that correct?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. In certain cases.

Mr. GARBER. Yes; in certain cases, a delegation of power to employees.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. But subject to review always by the commission or subject to appeal.

Mr. GARBER. Yes; that means, does it not, a delegation of the power of decision.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. GARBER. The power of decision in controversial matters.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes; it might be as to whether the freight charge had been right on a single car from one town to another town 50 miles down the road.

Mr. GARBER. Yes; but in controversial matters.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Where the whole commission should not be involved.

Mr. GARBER. And that would involve the exercise of what power? It would involve the exercise of the power with which the Constitution clothes you as a Member of the House, the legislative power of this country. Now, do you want me to say that I am willing to delegate such power to employees, unknown, to exercise the power that the people have clothed the Members of this House with? I hesitate to accede to such a request.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOCH). The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 additional minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. GARBER. I hesitate to accede to that request.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman permit me to say that if the commission is to hold hearings and decide on every question, big and little, we are going to have worse congestion all the time, because things are piling up down there all the while, and this is an effort to get decisions in important cases.

Mr. GARBER. There is not any question about the purpose of the gentleman from Washington. It is a purpose that is to be commended and supported by everyone, but as to whether or not the remedy, the machinery the gentleman sets up, is sufficient, I am loathe to say without further investigation.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I believe on further investigation the gentleman will think well of this effort.

Mr. GARBER. Now, here is the machinery that I set up to expedite the administration of the commission. It requests authority to delegate the power of the commission to an individual member, subject to review on appeal. I have introduced a bill which grants such authority; it authorizes the commission to delegate its power to an individual member of the commission, subject to review on appeal.

I go further than that and I make it compulsory on the commission to hold annual sessions in each one of the four group rate-making districts through one of its members exercising the power of the commission, subject to review on appeal.

What would this do? It would set up a convenient tribunal, convenient to the people for the administration of their complaints. Why should the people of the Pacific coast be compelled to travel 3,000 miles or more to present a complaint for a rate violation? Why should not the Congress exercise its function and perform its duty in setting up machinery convenient to the people?

Mr. MILLER. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I asked a question?

Mr. GARBER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MILLER. Is it the gentleman's idea that the decisions of these members of the commission that hold regional hearings shall go into effect immediately, subject to subsequent review?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; just like other decisions——

Mr. MILLER. They would go into effect immediately?

Mr. GARBER. Yes; the gentleman is right. Now, what would this machinery do? This machinery would take four members of the commission and put one in each of the group rate-making districts in the country, leaving seven members here at Washington. It would put one of the commissioners in each of the four group rate-making districts, require annual sessions to be held, and make their decisions subject to review on appeal.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. I yield.

Mr. ARNOLD. Is it the gentleman's idea that the members in Washington would be purely an appellate tribunal, without any original jurisdiction?

Mr. GARBER. It would have both original and appellate jurisdiction for all purposes.

Mr. ARNOLD. And that tribunal would prepare the general policy to be followed by the regional districts?

Mr. GARBER. It would. The commission is too large. It should be reorganized. Four members should hold annual sessions, one in each of the group rate-making districts of the country, leaving seven here at the Capital, five of whom would be sufficient to act as an appellate division, in addition to exercising original jurisdiction, leaving the other two members to conduct and supervise the work in valuations and the other more important fields of commission activities. Such would give us the machinery. It would double the capacity of the commission. It would be more satisfactory; it would be more representative of the people; it would be more responsible; it would be more efficient in administration.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the gentleman mean that one commissioner should sit or that four should sit?

Mr. GARBER. One should sit in each district, exercising the power of the commission, subject to review on appeal. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] during the general debate on the naval appropriation bill made a clear statement of the present parliamentary situation of the so-called retirement bill, S. 1727. It was only just and fair to the members of the Committee on the Civil Service, who labored long and faithfully on the proposed legislation, that the statement should be made.

Restated briefly, the facts are as follows: Hearings were held by the committee, the bill was reported favorably by unanimous vote; it took the usual course; the Rules Committee granted a rule, and the rule which was reported is still pending. The chairman of the Rules Committee can call the measure up for action by the House.

It is not my purpose to criticize any Member of the House for taking such action as his good judgment dictates, but here is a matter in which a controlling number of the Members are vitally interested. I am backed by a large majority in begging the chairman of the Rules Committee to permit a vote on this proposal. The question of the passage of this legislation has been before the House for practically the whole session.

Retirement for civil employees of the Government is not a new idea. It has been in successful operation for years by some of the leading governments of the world, and on a more liberal basis than is here proposed. It is in use by several of the States, by leading municipalities, such as Boston, New York City, Chicago, Philadelphia, and San Francisco; by banking and other business enterprises, and with much more liberality of provisions than have even been suggested for our Government employees.

The first law for our classified civil-service employees was passed in 1920. It was liberalized in 1926 by increasing the maximum annuity from $720 to $1,000 and raising the average annuity from $540 to $733. The contribution of the employees was increased from 2½ to 3½ per cent, which, in fact, paid the increased cost by reason of the benefits under the last amendment and reduced the Government's cost $29,000 annually, a questionable liberalization.

But this was not enough and not entirely fair to those who have spent the better portion of their lives in the Government service and until unfit to earn a livelihood in other work.

The United States Civil Service Commission in its last report recommended optional retirement after 30 years' service at 60 years of age. The commission well said it would make the system "flexible and humane" and cure abuses now existing.

The bill as reported by the committee offers optional retirement, cuts the optional ages by two years, increases the maximum annuity from $1,000 to $1,200 and the average annuity to about $820.

It is urged that these changes would add to the cost to an extent that the Government could not afford it. This argument is based on estimates of actuaries who have been consistently wrong. When the act was first passed we were told that the fund would be exhausted in 10 or 12 years. The fact is that it has risen to over a hundred million dollars, only nineteen million of which has been appropriated by the Congress. This fund (except as to the nineteen million just referred to, has come from contributions of the employees. The fund has not only taken care of all demands upon it but has actually accumulated a surplus of $83,000,000 aside from the Government contribution.

There is, of course, a theoretical liability upon the Treasury. The present ratio of normal cost is estimated at 3.98 per cent of the pay roll, of which the employees now contribute 3.50 per cent. The balance of 0.48 per cent rests on the Government. Under the proposed amendments the normal cost to the Government would be increased to 1.18 per cent, a small amount when compared with the benefits to be derived by the Government and its employees.

There is another element of cost that is sometimes misunderstood and that is the "accrued liability." When the law went into effect in 1920 employees then in the service and due to retire before the expiration of 30 years were not able to pay over the whole period. In the beginning this cost, 3.70 per cent of the pay roll, must be borne by the Government. This cost constantly decreases, as the employees contribute in increasing periods before retirement.

All of the cost, however, is offset by increased efficiency through the turnover in personnel. Mr. McCoy, the Government actuary, estimated this efficiency saving at 5 per cent, and Doctor Brown, of the Bureau of Efficiency, estimated the saving at slightly more than 6 per cent. Balancing this against the cost resting on the Government, it will be seen that the Government is the gainer through the operation of a liberalized retirement system.

Stated in another way, under the present law the Government pays 3.70 per cent on the pay roll for the accrued liability because of the fact that none of the employees have been able to pay into the fund for 30 years. This liability constantly decreases for 30 years when the normal cost alone prevails.

As an offset the Government saves more than 5 per cent because of increased efficiency caused by retiring an old man and employing a young man in his place. This is an investment that grows better every day, because after 30 years only the normal cost will prevail, of which the Government pays less than 0.50 per cent, while the employees pay 3½ per cent.

Under S. 1727 the Government would pay 1.18 per cent and the employees 3½ per cent of the normal cost, while the saving to the Government continues to the end of time. This is the entire proposition of cost before the House in the pending bill.

A majority of the Members of the House have expressed themselves as favorable to the legislation, and yet we are unable to get action. The functions of the House as a body representing the people are involved. The legislation is urgently demanded. I ask the leaders to permit the proposed legislation to come to a vote that we may all pass upon it in the light of our best judgment and not be compelled to go back to our people and explain that it is possible in their legislative body for a small group to prevent the consideration of legislation.

It is not in a spirit of criticism that the attention of the House is called to this matter, but in the interest of orderly legislation. We who are in favor of the bill are bound to do whatsoever we can to secure favorable action.

A petition addressed to the Speaker, the majority leader, and the chairman of the Rules Committee and the members of the steering committee and signed by more than 250 Members of the House has been signed, asking for consideration of the bill at this session.

Again we beg of the leaders an opportunity to pass judgment on this proposed legislation.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the subject that I am going to discuss is quite different from the full and able speech which has just been rendered by the distinguished Member [Mr. GARBER], who has just preceded me and which I found very interesting. I might say in passing that I have listened to the gentleman on two different occasions and his profound knowledge of the subject that he has discussed has made a marked impression upon me.

One of the most important questions remaining to be determined before this session of Congress is over is what action will be taken from the repeal, deference, or going into operation of the national-origins clause of the immigration law of 1924. The interest in this question is not confined to any one section of our country; neither is it confined to any one of the so-called nationals that constitute our inhabitants. The action of Congress on this question is being watched closely.

At the outset it must be borne in mind that the controversy over the national-origins clause of the immigration act has been misrepresented so as to be made to appear a controversy over increasing or decreasing numerically the number of immigrants that can come to this country. This misrepresentation is very unfortunate because it gives a false statement of facts. The repeal of the national-origins clause has nothing to do with the question of the number of people that shall be permitted to come here each year. The effort to repeal the national-origins clause has been characterized as an attack upon the immigration law of 1924. It is nothing of the kind. It is, in fact, an effort to prevent the law from being ridiculous.

The national-origins clause is a part of the immigration law of 1924. Nobody seems to know its real parenthood, although one John B. Trevor, of New York City, who was a captain in the Intelligence Department of the Army, detailed in New York City during the war, appears to claim the credit for it.

I have heard that the Ku-Klux Klan claims the credit for conceiving it and securing its adoption as an amendment to the immigration law. I am satisfied, however, that their only knowledge of it was after its adoption in the Senate in 1924, as an amendment to the bill that passed the House, and that thereafter the Ku-Klux Klan used it as a means of trying to carry out its purposes by attracting additional members to its ranks. It seems rather hard for me to believe that anything that such an organization might sponsor would receive the favorable consideration of either or both branches of Congress.

It appears from the records of the hearings of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization which reported the 1924 immigration law that the national-origins clause received little, if any, consideration from the committee. It is quite probable—and so far as I can find it is a fact—that it was not presented to the committee for consideration. In any event, when the bill was reported to the House it was not a part thereof, and during debate an amendment was offered in the House which included in substance the provisions of the present law. The amendment was rejected. The House later passed the bill, and while under consideration in the Senate Senator REED of Pennsylvania moved the amendment which inserted the present national-origins clause into the bill. Upon its return to the House it was sent to conference, and the House conferees recommended the adoption of the amendment, which action was taken. Whether or not it is correct, I am informed this amendment was reluctantly accepted by the House in order that the whole bill might not fail of passage.

As I have said before, this is to my mind one of the most important questions that confront us to-day, particularly in view of the fact that we have only a few weeks left in this session of Congress, and during which period it is essential that some affirmative action be taken in order to prevent the operation of this particular clause. To prevent its operation affirmative action must be taken by Congress. There are two ways in which we can take affirmative action, and when I say we, of course I refer to both branches of Congress. One is by joint resolution deferring its operation and the other is by enacting necessary legislation to repeal its provisions. The other procedure that we may employ is the passive, inactive negative, do-nothing method, as a result of which, in accordance with the ruling given by the Attorney General, as I understand it, the President of the United States is compelled on or before April 1 of this year to proclaim the provisions of this clause to be in operation. This means that the quotas established thereunder by the President's commission will become operative July 1, 1929.

That President's commission to which I refer was made up of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Labor, and the Secretary of Commerce (now President-elect Hoover), and they in turn each appointed two members of their respective departments as a joint committee to make a more thorough investigation of the matter.

I realize that men have different opinions and different views on this question. I appreciate the fact they have the right to entertain their views if they are honestly arrived at, and naturally every Member of this House arrives at honest views, so far as my opinion is concerned. I do not use the above language with the intent that you might infer that I have any feeling to the contrary, because you, like myself, are actuated by a desire to render that degree of public service in this body which you feel the best interests of the country demand and which is in accordance with your conscience. [Applause.]

I also considered it my duty to vote as my conscience dictated on any matters which came before any legislative body of which I was a member, and the question of party affiliation never influenced me unless a party principle or responsibility was involved. In that case I followed, and will follow, the principles enunciated by the Democratic Party, because the incorporation of them into law will be for the best interests of the people.

It is my belief that a public servant should represent all elements and political creeds in his district. So, in approaching this question, let me say that I recognize that men in both political parties differ and differ honestly.

I am going to try to impress upon you the fact that the basis of the determination, as provided in the national-origins clause, so-called, is almost impossible of ascertainment. It is left to the field of conjecture.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I will.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Is it not a fact you have to go back 300 years to determine the statistics as to national origin?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. And is it not a fact we have not the statistics available?

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly. That is in part correct. The basis prescribed by this clause for the establishing of quotas of countries affected has as its object a definite purpose which is unfair and discriminatory, and a reflection upon elements of past immigrants, now Americans, some for many generations, that have contributed so much toward the building up and progress of our country. The basis for computation is also uncertain and leaves the calculation, whichever it may be, to the field of conjecture. The clause provided a method of calculation which is incapable of ascertainment without resort to guesswork. Any such basis is bound to result in quotas which will be discriminatory, if not insulting, in their character. A careful examination of testimony presented to different committees, also books written by some of the proponents, and addresses made on different occasions by some of them justify the assertion that the underlying motive is un-American.

If we are going to establish an immigration policy, let it be definite. Let it be certain. The expression of the principle should be definite and certain, whether it be a closed immigration policy, a restrictive immigration policy, or a partially restrictive policy as set forth in the 1924 act.

Let it be definite and certain, but not left to uncertainty; and let both branches of Congress determine with certainty not only the expression of the principle we believe in, but with certainty as to the quotas the different quota countries shall be entitled to. Not only does Congress, by permitting the national-origins clause to go into operation, evade the duty of making the quotas themselves, but it passes the responsibility to the President's commission, composed of three Secretaries, and they in turn pass it on to Doctor Hill and his associates.

I might say at this time that I intend to follow the suggestion made by Governor Smith in his statement after the last election, in which he urged the Democratic Members of Congress to support President-elect Hoover during his term of office on all legislation that relates to the general welfare and progress of the people.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I hope at some not distant time the gentleman will inform the House what the fundamental principles of the Democratic Party are.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think those fundamental principles are so well known that the average man knows them, but I shall be glad to enlighten the gentleman out in the lobby some time.

The first indication of the unreliability and uncertainty of the basis of determination as provided in the national-origins clause was the postponement of its operation until July 1, 1927, in order that the quotas might be established. In order to regulate immigration up to the going into effect of the national-origins clause it was provided in the 1924 act—that the annual quota of any nationality shall be 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born individuals of such nationality resident in continental United States as determined by the United States census of 1890, but the minimum quota of any nationality shall be 100.

This, like the national-origins clause, only governed quota countries. The practical operation of the present law meant that 164,000 immigrants constituted 2 per cent of our foreign-born population as of 1890, and were allotted among the several European countries in accordance with the terms of this provision. Whether one believes in the policy of restrictive immigration or not, there is no question but what the original provision is at least definite and certain in its theory and operation. While the national-origins clause is certain as to the number of immigrants admissible each year from Europe, which is 153,000, every other provision thereof is unreliable, uncertain, and therefore inequitable.

This would be particularly so in its operation, if it ever goes into effect. I want to call to the attention of the Members that in accordance with the provisions of the national-origins clause the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor, as a joint board, each appointed two representatives to try and perform the impossible task therein provided. It is fair to infer from all correspondence made by them that they approached this task with the realization of its difficulty of approximate ascertainment, and the fact that, in the main, they would have to rely upon conjecture. The results have clearly shown that to be the fact. Their work has been tirelessly and unselfishly rendered and yet their reports and findings are the strongest evidence of the human impossibility of performing such a task. In their report on December 16, 1926, will be found the following:

We have found our task by no means simple, but we are carrying it out by methods which we believe to be statistically correct, utilizing the data that are available in accordance with what seems to us to be the intent and meaning of the law. We have not completed our work, but the figures which we are submitting for your information, though provisional and subject to revision, indicate approximately what the final results will be.

What stronger evidence of uncertainty?

Accompanying this report were the quotas which they had determined in accordance with the law, and which, while not complete and subject to revision, indicate approximately what the final results will be. These are not my words, but the words of Doctor Hill and his associates.

Thereafter, the operation of the law was deferred until July 1, 1928, and on February 27, 1928, other quotas were recommended by Doctor Hill and his associates. Having in mind the statement above quoted from report of 1927, that the 1927 quotas "indicated approximately what the final results will be," a comparison of these two quotas is very interesting and convincing as showing further the grave uncertainty of the basis of determination.

As a further indication of the uncertainty that existed in the minds of the President's commission, I quote a letter to the President under date of January 3, 1927:

JANUARY 3, 1927.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Pursuant to the provisions of sections 11 and 12 of the immigration act of 1924, we have the honor to transmit herewith the report of the subcommittee appointed by us for the purpose of determining the quota of each nationality in accordance with the provisions of said sections.

The report of the subcommittee is self-explanatory, and, while it is stated to be a preliminary report, yet it is believed that further investigation will not substantially alter the conclusions arrived at.

Although this is the best information we have been able to secure, we wish to call attention to the reservations made by the committee and to state that in our opinion the statistical and historical information available raises grave doubts as to the whole value of these computations as a basis for the purposes intended. We therefore can not assume responsibility for such conclusions under these circumstances.

Yours faithfully,

FRANK B. KELLOGG,
Secretary of State,
Department of State.
HERBERT HOOVER,
Secretary of Commerce,
Department of Commerce.
JAMES J. DAVIS,
Secretary of Labor,
Department of Labor.

Furthermore, on February 25, 1928, the President's commission in transmitting the 1928 quotas above referred to said:

We wish it clear that neither we individually nor collectively are expressing any opinion on the merits or demerits of this system of arriving at the quotas. We are simply transmitting the calculations made by the departmental committee in accordance with the act.

An analysis of the report of Doctor Hill and his associates, dated December 16, 1926, showing the manner upon which calculations were determined is further evidence of the impossibility of a fair determination, particularly in determining what portion of our white population of 1920 is derived from the "old native stock" of 1790. The records of immigration giving the number of immigrants arriving annually from each foreign country from 1820 to 1920 was in part relied upon. It is a well-known fact that a good portion of those who came from southern Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and Ulster came on vessels that started from an English port and were listed as emigrating from England. This was particularly true prior to 1870. In the case of Scotland, Wales, and Ulster it makes no difference, because their quotas under this law will be combined into one, but this situation seriously affects the quota that southern Ireland would be entitled to. Such a situation is further evidence of the grave uncertainty of a determination that will not be discriminatory.

The above immigration quotas were printed for the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, and column No. 1 is the report for 1928, column 2 the report for 1927, both made by Doctor Hill and his associates, and column 3 is the quotas under the present law.

Columns 1 and 2 relate to the national origins clause and the marked difference between them in the short period of one year seems to me to be inescapable evidence of the uncertainty of ascertainment.

A comparison will show that under the quotas that will be established if the national origins clause goes into effect that Germany will be reduced from 51,227 to 24,908; Irish Free State from 28,567 to 17,427; Norway from 6,453 to 2,403; Sweden from 9,561 to 3,399; Switzerland from 2,081 to 1,614; Denmark from 2,789 to 1,234; France from 3,954 to 3,308; while Great Britain and northern Ireland will be increased from 34,007 to 65,894; Austria from 785 to 1,639; Belgium from 512 to 1,328; Hungary from 473 to 1,181; Italy from 3,845 to 5,989; Netherlands from 1,648 to 3,083; Russia from 2,248 to 3,540. These are the most important changes that will occur. As I have said before the strongest evidence of uncertainty is the difference between the report of 1927 and 1928.

Another year has gone by since the last computation was submitted and which will be the quotas if the national origins clause goes into effect. It is fair to assume that if a report had been made this year by Doctor Hill and his associates that further changes would have been noted.

In passing, I want it clearly understood that I have the greatest of admiration for Doctor Hill and his associates. They are performing what must be to them an unpleasant task, because of its impossibility of performance. They have performed their work unselfishly and tirelessly. They are simply trying to carry out the law. It is clear from their reports, so far as I am concerned, that they realize that the records are so lacking that they had to rely upon conjecture.

It is significant that the only census taken in the United States prior to 1850 was that of 1790. In the 1790 census only the heads of families were reported, and there was no indication of the land of their nativity or of their ancestors.

Doctor Hill and his associates deemed that they would have to depend in the main upon the sounding of names to determine nativity, and he frankly admitted in the House hearings held in 1927 that names may indicate origin from any one of two or more countries. He further said that in the event of the names having an origin from England or Scotland or Ireland the probabilities were that because of the predominance of the English of foreign birth and descent at that time the census takers designated them as being of English descent.

The census of 1790 showed the white population of the then 17 States was 3,172,444. The following figures show in detail the population of the several States, with an estimate of the strength of the various nationals therein, which, so far as I can ascertain, is based upon guesswork:

[1] Less than one-tenth of 1 per cent.

[2] Included in "All other."

As one indication of the uncertainty of relying on the 1790 census I may mention that it does not take into consideration the size of the families and that some nationalities are quite prone to more productivity than others.

In determining the quotas under the national origins clause the white population of 1920, numbering about 94,000,000, were divided into two groups, one called "old native stock" and the other "immigrant stock." The census of 1790 was taken as the basis for determining what portion of our population in 1920 were descended from the population of 1790. It was determined that 41,000,000 persons in the United States in 1920 were descendents of the "old native stock." Bearing the fact in mind that all persons who arrived here since 1790, or their descendents, are described as "immigrant stock," and looking through the roll of the Members of Congress it is apparent to me that 80 per cent of our membership fall within that class.

When you consider that the first decennial census taken in the United States, outside of the one in 1790, was in 1850; that there are no official records prior to 1790, together with the loss, in the Ellis Island fire in 1896, of records of immigrations that flowed through the great city of New York from 1820 on, the destruction of many historical records by the British, when they occupied the city of Washington in the War of 1812, together with many other matters of consideration, we can then realize the impossibility of establishing quotas which will not be discriminatory to some of our nationals.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Is it not a fact that Doctor Hill testified before the Committee on Immigration that he could only go back about 100 years?

Mr. McCORMACK. My impression is that Doctor Hill testified that the United States decennial censuses could only go back to 1850; that the records of the ports of entry go back only to about 1820; that is, the immigrants coming into different ports of entry, as distinguished from the facts revealed in the decennial censuses. My observation and study further show that thousands and thousands of immigrants coming from Germany, from Ireland, from Scotland, and from other places were compelled to come over on ships owned by English interests and they were listed as English citizens.

That is not submitted as criticism, but as a piece of evidence. Everything based on conjecture is bound to be discriminatory and offensive to some of our nationals. We are not an English, or an Irish, or a German, or a French nation. We do not want any element to predominate. We are an American Nation. We may have a great feeling of fondness and regard for the land of our forbears, as we should, but above every other consideration we are Americans. The history of the recent war has evidenced the fact that Americanism means the same thing to all of our citizens, irrespective of their national origin—that is, love of flag, country, and that upon which everything that we possess governmentally stands, the Constitution of the United States.

We want Americans. We want the immigrants who come over here—the same as my forbears did two generations ago—to be filled with a love of our institutions. To a certain extent, undoubtedly, they will come here seeking material gain, but in the main they look up to this Government of ours as a land of opportunity. I recognize that conditions might change our immigration policy. That necessity might arise some day when we might consider the advisability of a change, but if we are going to have a change, let it be definite and certain, not only in principle but definite and certain in practice.

Now, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the fact that this uncertainty exists is further evidenced by the report made by the President's commission, comprised, as I said before, of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Labor, and the Secretary of Commerce—the then Secretary of Commerce, President-elect Hoover. Not only that, but President-elect Hoover in his acceptance speech said he favored the repeal of the national-origins clause. He recognized the impossibility of human determination in accordance with the basis provided in that law. He recognized the offensiveness of it, and he recognized that this was not bringing into effect in America a new policy with reference to the restriction of immigration, because we have it now. We have it now in the act of 1924. Two per cent of the foreign-born population as of 1890 means approximately 164,000 immigrants who are entitled to admission from quota countries in Europe each year, and in turn the number to which each country is entitled is simply a matter of mathematics. That can be arrived at. It is a definite and certain enunciation of a principle, and it naturally follows that there is a definite and certain determination of the quotas.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Can the gentleman tell the House how this national origins was determined, based upon what figures, what the present quota is as based on the act of 1924, and what would be the quota of all nationals under the national-origins clause? Has the gentleman those figures?

Mr. McCORMACK. As I understand it, the present law permits one hundred and sixty-four thousand and a few odd hundred to come in each year, while the national-origins clause authorizes one hundred and fifty-three and some few hundreds to come in each year. Am I correct?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. While the national-origins clause provides a maximum of 150,000, it also provides in addition that certain countries which had no quota before or whose computation would be less than 100, are entitled to the admission of a minimum of 100, and that is the reason why it comes to approximately 153,000.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. As I understand it, the gentleman is opposed to the national-origins provision of the present law?

Mr. McCORMACK. Precisely.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Does the gentleman favor the quota based on the 1890 census? The present law is based on the 1890 census, as I understand.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; and that is definite and certain.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Does the gentleman favor the 1890 census as a basis, or some other census—the 1910 census or the 1920 census?

Mr. McCORMACK. To be frank with the gentleman, his question goes into something that I did not intend to discuss, and I am equally frank in saying that I am rapidly approaching a mental state where I realize that through necessity we must close this open door and bring about some kind of a restriction. Whether that should be based on the 1910 census or the 1890 census is just a question of policy, based upon the necessity.

I can see where conditions might change; where in the years to come through depletion in our population, because of some great catastrophe, for example—and population increases either by a greater number of births than deaths or by an increase in immigration over emigration; that is the only means through which an increase in population takes place—and I can see where a principle applicable to one period might of necessity be changed when applied to conditions in a different period.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. We are legislating for this period.

Mr. McCORMACK. I have no objection to the present quota, based on the 1890 census.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. The proposed change would greatly facilitate the administration of the law, would it not?

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman refer to the national-origins clause?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not think so.

Mr. GARBER. I mean that the proposed change to a definite basis would greatly facilitate the administration of the law.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman means the law as it exists at present?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I agree with the gentleman. Now, bearing on that, may I call attention to a statement made by the Commissioner General of Immigration in his annual report for 1925, page 29:

> The bureau feels that the present method of ascertaining the quotas is far more satisfactory than the proposed determination by national origin; that it has the advantages of simplicity and certainty. It is of the opinion that the proposed change will lead to great confusion and result in complexities, and accordingly it is recommended that the pertinent portions of section 11, providing for this revision of the quotas as they now stand, be rescinded.

I am now coming back to 1790. One interesting phase of the evidence about the 1790 census, where it showed a little over 3,000,000 in the 17 States, was in the State of Pennsylvania, as indicating the uncertainty of the 41,000,000 being even approximately a fair estimate of the descendants of the inhabitants as shown in that census.

I do not want to depend upon memory, so let me quote verbatim from the extract which I have here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. McCORMACK. In an article written in 1789, as to the immigration into Pennsylvania in the period around 1749, it was said by the writer that—

> In the summer of the year 1749, 25 sail of large vessels arrived with German passengers alone, which brought about 12,000 souls, some of the ships about 600 each; and in several other years near the same number of these people arrived annually.

This is for only a limited period around 1746, and it is fair to assume that some came before and some came afterwards, and yet according to the 1790 census there were only 110,000 Germans in the State of Pennsylvania.

But let us go a step further:

> And in some years nearly as many annually from Ireland.

Yet in 1790 there was only an estimated population of 8,000 in the State of Pennsylvania of either Irish birth or Irish descent.

This is some evidence indicating the uncertainty we have in the records prior to 1790. We have absolutely none from 1790 to 1820, and from 1820 our records of ports of entry are entirely unreliable, first, because of giving their birth in the wrong country, in some cases because of necessity; and, second, because the records in the city of New York were destroyed in the Ellis Island fire in 1896. Furthermore, many historical records of the colonial days were destroyed when the British occupied the city of Washington during the War of 1812.

All of these things have brought about an air of uncertainty so that the basis for the determination of national origins is inadvisable, unwise, inequitable, bound to be discriminatory because in the main it is left to the field of conjecture.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Under the present quota law Ireland receives a quota of 28,000, but under the national origins law, if it takes effect, Ireland only gets 8,000, thereby losing 20,000.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think there have been two corrections made since that estimate.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Is there anything the gentleman can find from his investigation to show how they base that loss, upon what percentage and how far they have gone back?

Mr. McCORMACK. That basis of 8,330 was an estimate given by Captain Trevor, who, I understand, is the parent of this idea, although the Ku-Klux Klan claims the credit for it.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The parent of this piece of legislation is Mr. REED. The House never passed it at all.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; in the Senate it was an amendment offered by Senator REED of Pennsylvania, and right there let me say that if this law goes into effect it is those of German birth and descent and those of Irish birth and descent in Pennsylvania that in the main can take the blame.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. May I ask the gentleman another question? Senator REED takes the credit for it, but he borrowed it from Senator Lodge. Does the gentleman know that?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; this Captain Trevor consulted Senator Lodge first, who took him to Senator REED.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. You will find the date given in the hearing as March 6, 1924.

Mr. McCORMACK. There is just one more reference I might make. During the past few days a representative of the American Legion unfortunately made a reference with which I am not in accord. I am sorry he made this reference, because I am a member of the Legion and the two other members of my family, two younger brothers, who constitute the whole family, are also members of the Legion. This representative made a statement which is offensive to all of our citizens, and I hope sincerely that the Legion members throughout the country who might be offended by it will not go to the unwise direction of resigning their membership.

The American Legion is a great body. It is a much-needed body, the same as the Veterans of Foreign Wars, which is another one of our great veterans' organizations, as well as all of the minor organizations which have as their foundation purposes consistent with the progress of our country in establishing traditions which the future generations will be proud of; but in this particular respect, by stating that the Legion is in favor of the national-origins provision, they have taken a position which, if a referendum were submitted to the members of the Legion, would undoubtedly amaze the Members of Congress as to the vote to the contrary in the Legion.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. May I say to my colleague that I have just received three telegrams from three Legion posts in Lawrence, Peabody, and Lynn, Mass., saying that the sentiments which the representatives of the Legion gave before the committee are not in accord with the sentiment of the membership of those posts?

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman for his observation. May I say at this time that Mr. CONNERY recently displayed the finest act of courage that I have ever seen on the part of any legislator when he voted for the reapportionment bill. I hope that his constituents appreciate his type of representation.

May I add, the danger of this, Mr. Chairman, is that we are going back 300 years and making you and me, who are Americans, and consider ourselves Americans, take a position which would destroy the assimilation which all elements and all races have undergone during the past 300 years, and making not only the foreign born of 1920 take a position on this but every one of us, no matter what the origin of our common ancestors who first came to America may have been?

But going back to the American Legion, it has taken a position on quotas. When they take a position favoring the underlying principle of the national-origins clause, they take a position upon the quotas, and when they do that they make a mistake and they exceed the purposes of their organization.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I will.

Mr. SCHAFER. Has the American Legion in convention assembled gone on record in favor of the national-origins scheme for determining the immigration quotas?

Mr. McCORMACK. I understand they have, yes; but it was very peculiarly worded:

Therefore be it resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That we favor and recommend continuance of the method of restriction upon immigration—

That is a primary part, and they may have the right to do that. They could go on record in favor of closed or open or restricted immigration. I do not dispute their authority to do that; but then the resolution continues:

That we favor and recommend continuance of the method of restriction upon immigration in the 1924 immigration law with its fundamental national-origins provision, so that American citizenship and economic prosperity may be maintained at the highest possible level.

And in a statement to the Senate Committee on Immigration they said:

We emphatically uphold the theory underlying the national-origins provision, which is that immigration quotas based upon entire population of the Nation is not only the fairest method for selecting immigrants, but is the most certain method—

Mark this language—

the most certain method of maintaining in the future the blend of population and the racial mixtures as they exist in America to-day.

In convention assembled they went on record in favor of that because it was the best means "by which prosperity may be maintained at the present time," the resolution read.

It must be borne distinctly in mind that the quotas can not be disassociated from the principle itself. The going into effect of the clause automatically established the quotas, and when the Legion takes a position on the principle they take a position on the quotas established thereunder.

What those quotas will be are a matter of record. Furthermore, the representative said that it was a question between patriotism and slackerism. I also deny such a question is involved. In support of this argument he cited the number of aliens that claimed exemption in the late war. In the first place, the figures do not present the facts correctly. In the second place, the only inferences to draw therefrom is that the nationals of those countries which will receive a reduced quota by the operation of the national origins were the slackers in the late war. This is not only vicious and unwarranted but false. Such an argument is an attack not only on those foreign born who were here in 1917–18 but upon all generations of Americans of the same blood or descent. Let us see who they are that will suffer by the operation of the national-origins clause and then we can see what elements of our citizenry were insidiously offended and insulted by this argument.

The French, Swiss, Swedish, Norwegians, Danish, Irish, and Germans. All elements representing our best blood, the equal of any other and second to none. In every great crisis their descendants have proven their love for our flag and our institutions of government as set forth in the Constitution. In the Revolutionary War their representation was outstanding, particularly the Irish and the Germans, and the French Government showed its friendship in a way that occupies one of the foremost pages in our history. Are they slackers? Some may think so, but history records otherwise. During the Civil War alone the Irish and the Germans in the service outnumbered the whole army of the South, and each element, as we are compelled to refer to them under this law, had more men in service than any other element of our citizenry. And, yes; after the war was over, and when the men of the South had laid down their arms, and after the death of the great President, which was an unfortunate event for the South at that time, an unthinking North imposed conditions upon the South that were unbearable and inhuman. In the dark days of the carpet-bagging period of the days of reconstruction following the war the only voice raised in Congress for the South were the Representatives in Congress from the city of New York, all of Irish descent, and Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts. It was their voices that finally brought about some degree of reason.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then the American Legion did not go on record in favor of the national-origins clause?

Mr. McCORMACK. All I know is what it says in this statement, and from that I draw certain inferences. The gentleman's inferences are as good as mine. I am going to rely on my inference and I do not think the gentleman and I will have any dispute. May I further say to the gentleman that the great agricultural districts of the country have been brought to their present high level by that class of immigrants which the national-origins scheme will discriminate against, and I hope it will be brought to a higher state by the enactment of legislation which will be carrying out the platforms of both parties.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will state that the people of the great State of Wisconsin are absolutely opposed to the national-origins clause, and so are the members of the American Legion in my State. I am not talking about the few officers who may claim to speak for the Legion. The national-origins clause should be repealed. The gentleman is making a fine argument for its repeal.

Mr. McCORMACK. Some argument has been advanced on the question of certain nationals failing to assimilate. What is the best test of assimilation? To me it is what percentage of immigrants from different countries indicate their permanence and love for America by becoming a citizen. The records of the census of 1920 are interesting in this respect. I will simply read it and allow you to draw your own conclusions:

The census of 1920 shows that the foreign born from England proper, who were here when that census was taken and who were naturalized, is 64.8; Scotland, 65.6; Wales, 73.5; Ireland, 72.3; Norway, 67.3; Sweden, 69.5; Denmark, 69.6; Netherlands, which has a marked gain, 58.1; Belgium, which has a gain, 55.3; Switzerland, 64.9; France, 60.1; Germany, 73.3; Canada, French, 47.0; Canada, others, 58; and other countries, ranging from 44.7 down to 8.9, every one of the latter of which, under national origins, will gain, with the exception of Rumania.

The argument has also been advanced by certain people that America must maintain a British ascendancy in order that our institutions of Government might be preserved. They say that the operation of the national-origins clause will bring that situation about. Since when has the United States had to depend upon any other country for its existence? The last time that history records that we were a dependency of England was prior to 1776. Yorktown, with its victory, brought about the consummation of our independence. In that conflict for independence, 10,000 men of Irish blood served from Massachusetts alone. Those of German descent, particularly from Pennsylvania, showed their love for the cause of freedom. Likewise, those of Swiss, Swedish, French, Scotch, and other nativities, rendered yeoman service. No one excelled the other. They fought inspired.

We can not deny, and would not want to deny it, that those of English blood and extraction have contributed in every way in the settling of the Colonies, in the War for Independence, and in building up our country and protecting it in time of danger, but we should not discriminate against others who have likewise done their duty.

The operation of the national-origins clause is an affirmative statement by the Congress of the United States that the continuity of our Government is dependent upon England. Such a declaration of subservience should be abhorrent to all who consider themselves Americans.

Mr. Chairman, both parties through their standard bearers in the recent campaign went on record as favoring the repeal of the national-origins clause. Between now and March 4 action will have to be taken in order to prevent its operation. While both parties have responsibilities, the party in the majority will be directly responsible for this iniquitous, discriminatory law unless proper action is taken to repeal or defer its operation. [Applause from both sides of the aisle.]

I have received the following telegrams from American Legion posts:

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MORROW].

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the House, the Indian problem has been a problem in the United States since the inception of the Government. The Indians were here when the white man first discovered America. It is true that the Indian was the first owner and that he was in control of a large part of the American Continent when the white settlements commenced upon the shores of America.

The Indian may have been mistreated by the white men, but in the conquest and settlement, in the civilization of any country, it appears that the world has always developed and passed through the same stages to bring about a real civilization. The Indian is entitled to proper and just consideration at the hands of this Government.

Much criticism is raised as to the manner in which the Indian has been and is being treated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs of the Interior Department.

An article appeared from the pen of Vera Connelly in the February number of Good Housekeeping Magazine. This article, entitled "The Cry of a Broken People," was placed in the RECORD on the Senate side. The article reflects upon the treatment of the Indians in various States; specific charges are made against two Indian boarding schools in the State of New Mexico, namely the Albuquerque and the Santa Fe Indian Schools.

The Santa Fe Indian School has 500 boarding-school students, and the Albuquerque Indian School has from 800 to 875 students. Let me give you a picture of the equipment in the two schools:

The Albuquerque School, of New Mexico, is located in the very heart of the Indian country, convenient to all Pueblos, to the Navajos, the Apache, Hopi, and Zuni Tribes.

The school has a capacity increased from 850 to 900. The average attendance for the past year was 847. The school offers work through the twelfth grade, and industrial training is given in all grades above the third. The school grounds cover 154 acres. One hundred acres are cultivated, 24 acres are in pasture land, corrals, and ditches, and 30 acres are in the school campus.

A dairy herd of 86 cows produces milk for the pupils. An average of 60 cows produce milk at one time. It is the intention to increase this herd to 110 or 120 in order that each pupil may have 1 quart of milk daily, and to produce milk for the new hospital, with a capacity for 110. During the fiscal year 1928 the following was produced on the school farm:

Forage for stock	$3,500.00
Garden and dairy products	16,500.00
Total	20,000.00
Expenditure made for use at school for forage, garden, and seed	8,629.50

Statistical statement of the Santa Fe Indian School

The Santa Fe nonreservation boarding school, located in north central New Mexico, has a capacity for 500 pupils and carries work through the ninth grade. The total enrollment for the past year was 540. The average daily attendance was 490. The school farm comprises a total area of 117 acres. About 58 acres are under cultivation. Ten more acres could be used for garden purposes.

This school maintains nine fairly good cows, which average $4,500 worth of milk per year. Because of the dry climate in this locality it is thought more economical to depend on purchased milk than to increase the present dairy herd.

	1930	1929	1928
Superintendent's salary	$3,000.00	$2,800.00	$2,750.00
Drayage	250.00	200.00	308.79

Total	15,000.00	14,500.00	12,320.23

Besides these two schools, the following Indian schools are maintained in New Mexico:

	Students
Mescalero School	150
Jicarilla School	150
Charles H. Burke School	600
Shiprock School	400
Zuni Pueblo	150

It is the policy of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to place children in the boarding schools when they have reached the sixth grade, and to keep them there until they finish from the ninth to the twelfth grade. A child, from 6 years of age (with but few exceptions, when they are sent to the boarding schools at such early age) are sent to day schools, and come home at night; they go to the day school until they have reached the sixth grade.

The Government has expended vast sums of money in the erection of modern, well-equipped school buildings and dormitories. All modern conveniences, heat, lights, water, sanitary facilities, outdoor swimming pools, and so forth, are provided. The subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, in charge of Interior Department items, consisting of Mr. CRAMTON, of Michigan; Mr. FRENCH, of Idaho; and Mr. TAYLOR, of Colorado, visited many of these schools in 1926, and especially the schools at Albuquerque and Santa Fe. I accompanied this committee. These schools were found modern and well equipped. The students were in splendid physical and mental condition. Great progress is being made by the Indian school pupils both in their physical appearance and in educational advancement.

The principal of the Albuquerque Indian School states that about three years ago, when they were seeking an instructor in music, but two parties qualified were found in Albuquerque who had the proper music degree; one of the two was Mary Young Nesbitt, an Indian girl. She is now instructor of music in the Indian school, having under her charge 32 Indian girls in piano and as many in voice. During the celebration of Armistice Day in Albuquerque the Indian school band furnished the music which led the parade. This shows conclusively that this school is modern in every way.

The Government has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in establishing these boarding and day schools in many of the Indian reservations of the State. The Albuquerque, Santa Fe, and Charles H. Burke Schools are examples. Great advancement is being made in the education of the Indian children. It has long been determined that the taking of the boys and girls, especially after they reach the sixth grade, from the day school and putting them in boarding schools tends to lift them from their Indian habits to adopt the manner and method of living of the white boy and girl. In this education we are fitting them for their future success in life.

The Government spends upon each one of these students, during the period they are in school, $225 per school year.

In order that this matter may be brought directly before you, to refute the charges made, it is necessary to get some idea of what really is occurring to the American Indian.

For many years the Indian population was decreasing, and it was said that within a short time the race would disappear. Since modern methods were established, to take care of the Indian child in infancy and teaching the Indian mother proper care and treatment at childbirth, the Indian population has been increasing. To-day perhaps there are more Indians in the United States than at the time Columbus discovered America.

The Navajo population in New Mexico is increasing, and certainly the Navajos are not a poverty stricken people. The Navajos in Arizona and New Mexico have immense herds of sheep and cattle; it is said that they have something like a million and a half head of sheep and goats; more sheep on their reservation than there is in possession of all the New England States and some of the Middle Atlantic States combined:

Note the resources of the Navajos, New Mexico and Arizona:

Eastern Navajos:
Sheep	110,000
Goats	50,000
Head of cattle	1,500
Individual income from this source last year	$375,000
From sale of blankets and silverware	$60,000
In salaries and wages	$30,000
Northern Navajos:
Sheep	122,500
Goats	40,000
Cattle	5,000
Income last year	$525,200
In crops	$50,000
In blankets and native handiwork	$85,000
In salaries and wages	$150,000
Southern Navajos:
Sheep	400,000
Cattle	35,000
Income last year	$800,000
Sale of blankets	$159,860
For 2,000,000 pounds of pinon nuts	$103,812
For Government wages	$111,340
From outside sources	$240,000
Western Navajos:
Sheep	300,000
Goats	40,000
Cattle	5,000
Income last year over	$100,000
In crops	$30,000
From sale of blankets and other native products	$149,500
In salaries and wages	$50,000

New Mexico has an Indian population of nearly 25,000. This includes some 10,766 Pueblo Indians; that peaceful tribe which became a part of the United States at the time of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; by that treaty the lands then in the possession of the Pueblo Indians went with them. It is true that their lands have been encroached upon, that they have intermarried with the whites, and much land has been absorbed in that way. But they still possess large tracts of valuable land, some irrigated and some timber and mineral land.

By the working of the Pueblo Indian Board restitution is being made for land that has passed from the Indians and settlement in money is being made where the land can not be reacquired. So the Government is not unjust in dealing with the Pueblo Indians.

The Navajos were the warlike Indians who kept the United States and Mexico in turmoil for more than a century. They were finally subdued and placed on the Navajo Reservation, comprising some 13,350,000 acres of land in Arizona, New Mexico, and Utah. The Navajos have become industrious and are rapidly changing their habits and becoming more Americanized. This is especially true of the younger Indian generation; the boys educated in the industrial Indian schools, like the Charles H. Burke School at Fort Wingate, N. Mex. It is said that boys going out from this school immediately request the building of more modern homes for their families in place of the crude hogan occupied by the Navajos for so many years.

The Navajos become good laborers on the railroads; they go into the railroad shops and learn the trade; they also work in the sugar and cotton fields. The Navajo population in New Mexico is now 10,709.

The Mescalero Apaches are also found in New Mexico. They are also making progress; they have large numbers of sheep and goats, and have one of the finest timber districts in New Mexico. The Apaches in New Mexico number 1,311.

We also have a few Utes on a small reservation in New Mexico. Most of the Utes are in southern Colorado. In New Mexico we have but few Utes.

The people of the State of New Mexico are pleased with the manner in which the department has handled the Indian situation in that State. They appreciate the cooperation given in the effort to give the Pueblo Indians what they are entitled to in land and education. This same cooperation has been given with the Navajo and Apache Tribes. The Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Meritt, has made personal investigations and has helped a great deal in the development of the Indians. He has been prompt to recommend action in granting the Indians more land to protect their watershed; also the granting of more lands for grazing purposes. The bureau has been prompt in settling quarrels between tribes and has adjusted land-title controversies among the Indians themselves. The Taos Pueblo Indians received a grant of land last year to protect their watershed. Various other grants of land have been made to the Indians since I have been a Member of Congress.

It is always a pleasure to assist in these matters when one knows that they will benefit the Indians. It is true that selfish interests wish to crowd the Indians out; but the Indian in the Southwest is being rehabilitated. It is not my purpose at this time to interfere with Indian management in any other State; I speak for the New Mexico Indian schools only. I represent that State and I am familiar with the conditions existing in the Indian schools of the State.

I believe I can truthfully say that the Indian boarding schools at Albuquerque and Santa Fe are well conducted and that they are among the leading Indian schools in the way of management and equipment in the United States. Of course, there is always some complaint. But this is true also of the ordinary large family in our country; there are always complaints among members of the family. The Indians, due to their tribal and other conditions, are largely considered in the nature of a big family, and some members of the family will complain of the treatment given them by the white men. But you find this condition among the whites; some are always complaining against the Government, its methods, and its laws and opportunities.

To bring the matter more clearly before you I desire to insert here some matters which have been brought to my attention. One is an article written by Mrs. Isis L. Harrington, principal of the Albuquerque Indian School, which is entitled "Lo, the Poor Taxpayer." Mrs. Harrington compares the Indian population with the white people:

LO, THE POOR TAXPAYER

ALBUQUERQUE, February 4.—The population of New Mexico consists of whites and Indians. The white population is town and rural. The Indian population is village and rural.

The whites enjoy the protection of our Government by accepting the responsibilities of citizenship along with the heavy taxation that accompanies it. The Indians enjoy the protection of our Government without the responsibility of citizenship and taxation.

Taxes and rents must be paid by the bulk of white citizens, whether they eat or not. Taxes and rents are vague terms to the majority of Indians of the Southwest.

The Mexican sheep raiser raises his sheep, conforms to Federal and State laws of sanitation for them at his own expense. The Indian sheep raiser raises his sheep.

The Mexican sheep raiser rides a burro. The Navajo sheep raiser drives an automobile.

The Mexican sheep raiser sells his wool and sheep to pay his lease bill and heavy taxes, stinting himself to eke out an existence for his family till next shearing time. The Indian sheep raiser sells his sheep and wool. What he does with the money is his own business.

The white parent must provide a school for his child, feed, clothe, and equip him with books, and keep him in school for a certain length of time. The Indian parent may send his child to a school provided for him by the Government, where all equipment is furnished and transportation paid.

Hundreds of New Mexico rural school children whose parents are taxpayers have never seen a bathtub, kitchen sink, or inside toilet. It would be hard to find as many Indian school children not perfectly familiar with all three in the entire United States.

Many rural school children in New Mexico count it a great treat when the county agent puts on a show of lantern slides depicting the life cycle of germs, bacteria, and plant fungi, or when the forest ranger by the same means shows how forests are protected. Many Indian schools have their own motion-picture machines, showing the same high-class pictures one sees in the city. The Albuquerque Indian school children have motion pictures every alternate Saturday night. Lantern slides bore them dreadfully.

The public-school child who can furnish his instrument, music, and instructor has a chance at some musical training. The Indian school child needs but the willingness. Three years ago, I am told, but two persons in Albuquerque and vicinity had degrees in music. One was an Indian girl, Mary Young Nesbit, instructor at the Albuquerque Indian school, instructing 32 girls in piano and as many in voice. Mr. Taxpayer, did you notice your large family of none-too-well-clothed and fed fellows adoringly following the Indian school boy band in the Armistice Day parade? Some day it will dawn upon those little chaps just how they got that way.

Mrs. White Citizen, when your baby is due where will you go? Who will pay the bill? In the Albuquerque Indian school hospital a month or so ago I visited the maternity ward to see two young mothers, both former students, and their two healthy baby boys. Mothers and babies had received the best of professional care from a first-class physician and two registered nurses. When these two young Indian mothers—Mrs. Maggie Howard Wilson and Mrs. Lulu Hathorn Tsyitee—were strong again they returned to their homes, both in Albuquerque. There was no charge. All were glad to have them come. They are following the teaching of the old school in which both finished second-year high.

And Mrs. Taxpayer, where did your daughters go for a job after finishing high school? Girls from the Albuquerque Indian high school are making good in positions paying from $1,080 to $1,200 per year. And your son. Maybe he had to drop out when he finished the eighth grade.

Now, Mr. Sick White Man, are you paying to bask in the glorious sun of New Mexico in an expensive sanatorium or are some of you tucked off in a mountain cabin chasing the cure? Or have you a ragged scrap of canvas stretched from the side of a discarded freight car under the shade of which you lie on a cast-off Army cot with a few poor cooking utensils in which you prepare whatever food you caught? The Government has provided sanatoria in the Southwest for tubercular Indians, and each year is building more.

Mrs. Taxpayer, is it a problem for you to dispose of the left overs from your table or do your youngsters rush to the cupboard as soon as they return from school and clean it out before you can say "scat"? And do you have all the good, fresh meat your boys can eat at least once a day? At the Indian school at Albuquerque it is a difficult problem to dispose of the left overs. Twelve large dish pans, heaping full, after the noon meal. And one poor boy didn't have enough to eat.

And, Mrs. Taxpayer, do you ever have to chastise your children? If not, then why do you complain so numerously and vehemently to superintendents of Indian schools when his students prowl about your premises, break your window panes, or run down your car with his truck? The big complaint about educated Indians is from their disobedience and lack of responsibility. Not long ago, after an Indian boy had driven his truck broadside into a woman's sedan, he was asked by an officer: "Why did you do that"

It is said the boy answered without the shadow of a smile: "She was driving a Dodge. I thought she would dodge."

At Indian schools there is as little discipline as possible. Government employees are much more charitable and lenient with Indian children than they are with whites. So are you.

If you think the Government does not protect the Indian just try to collect a debt off him. If you feel that he isn't protected by Uncle Sam, let him run into your car with his. If you think the noncitizen Indian is subject to the same laws you are, try to get a court to try him.

Mr. Taxpayer, when investigating the schools and hospitals you are providing for the Indians, see that every school and hospital of every kind in your entire State receives the very same thorough investigation. Then, and not till then, will there be a basis for a judgment of any value.

The Indian is as noble, self-reliant a race as you will find. Pablo Abeita, the sage of Isleta, gave an excellent statement of his problem. The Indian is deluged with a brand new civilization and must be given a chance to fit himself to his new surroundings.

Mr. Taxpayer, you must do that. You are willing to do it. But, are you going to pay for every frill and fad foisted upon the Indian's unwilling shoulders by sob sisters, sentimentalists, sensationalists, and parlor bolshevists who, while they might be the first to decry its plight, would certainly be the last to get right down and work for his real good as do Government workers—both Indian and white—in the field and in Washington?

The Indian himself is beginning to see a bit of what is going on behind the smoke screen let down in the name of his welfare by those whose main object is to keep the Indian down while they pillage and exploit him. Those forces can not get at him freely until the Government steps aside. Taxpayers and citizens, both white and Indians, you are the Government.

(MRS.) ISIS L. HARRINGTON,
Principal United States Indian School, Albuquerque, N. Mex.

Now note the report made on the Santa Fe Indian School. This investigation was made by a committee consisting of Gov. R. C. Dillon, Dana Johnson, editor of the Santa Fe New Mexican, and Dr. George Luckett, director of public health. Their report, in part, was as follows:

Food was found to be abundant, clean, and of good variety. Check of individual weight charts shows steady gain in weights. Clothing was found adequate, warm, and of good quality. Pupils receive hospital care from resident physicians and trained nurses.

DISEASE UNDER CONTROL

New building under construction will afford improved modern hospitalization. Disease is apparently under good control. There are now 42 cases of trachoma, which the physicians and nurses say is a decrease of 25 per cent during the present school year, and the number represents 8 per cent of the enrollment. The physicians report that all precautions are being taken to prevent spread of the disease. There is one tubercular case this year, the physicians said, and that patient was removed to a hospital at Laguna.

No jails could be found, and the superintendent and disciplinarians say that pupils are never locked up.

Sleeping accommodations appear clean and adequate, with the exception of some crowding in two rooms of the girls' dormitory.

CHILDREN HAPPY

We found no evidence of overworked pupils.

Cleanliness, sanitation, ventilation, and general living conditions were found to be good. None of the children made complaints, and they appeared to be contented, normal, happy, and healthy.

Let me read you a letter written by one of the Indian students at the Albuquerque Indian School. The letter is written in English characteristic of the Indian boy learning the language:

INDIANS WELL TREATED

[EDITOR'S NOTE.—The following letter, written by Huskie J. Burnside, Albuquerque Indian School student, takes issue with reports recently published in Good Housekeeping magazine that Indian School students are not well treated.]

EDITOR TRIBUNE:

I never been mistreated since I came to U. S. Government school. I'll try to explain myself how I was to be treated since I have been in roll the United States Government Indian School.

My the first I went to school in the Navajos Reservation boarding school at the Fort Defiance, Ariz. It was the eleven years ago now, since that time all the teachers and all the boss they surely treat me just fine like my own mother.

Because I am always obey my school rules and regulation when I was attending a school at the Ft. Defiance. After when I finished third, and the same time my brother Isidore Burnside he written a letter to me from the Albuquerque Indian School.

As he said in that letter, "brother this is the best school I ever attending now, so you can come to this school after when you finished six grade," said he.

VERY ANXIOUS

But I didn't finish six grade, because I was very anxious to to Albuquerque Indian School. Just as soon when the school start in September the first in the year of 1921. I asked my mother and father if I could go to the Albuquerque Indian School and also I have explain about that letter I got from my brother Isidore.

After a while my mother, father and the rest of my folks they are agree with me to go to Albuquerque Indian School. At the same time my father said to me before I leave to Albuquerque, Mr. R. Perry he is good man and he is one of my the first friend at the Ft. Defiance the time when he was superintendent at the fort.

Also he said, "Mr. Perry he use to treat me nice when I was Indian policeman at the Ft. Defiance," he said.

I don't see why some of the people they said the American Indian are mistreated and also they said Santa Fe boarding school and Albuquerque Indian School childrens are hungry.

OWN HARD LUCK

Maybe they mean some of boys and girls they are sleeping in and too lazy to get up in the morning on account of that they miss their breakfast by their own hard luck and then they will started to work from 7.30 to 11.30 o'clock.

If they are on time for breakfast formation they wont be hungry at all. Not only breakfast formation, as also church and school and daily formation.

As you all know, the person who are disobey the United States Government rules should be punishment like a man. Just the same as we do here at the Albuquerque Indian School. Of course some of the boys and girls they are usually disobey the rules of the school regulations. So we are the Indian childrens have to be punished by the disciplinarian and matron in order to training our mind for the next generation.

I came to this school here in the year 1921, Sept. 9. From there on up to this time I don't seeing anything wrong here at the Indian School. We always have plenty of food to eat by three time a day, and we have plenty clothing to wear.

We are the Indian boys have plenty a shop equipment, such as auto mechanics, engineer, tailor, blacksmith, carpenter, shoe and harness, and the same way in line of girls department, and they have place to learning such as home economy, nursery, sewing and laundry.

PLENTY OF EQUIPMENT

All of these different department they have plenty of equipment to work with and plenty of machines each of these department.

The same way in gym. We have all kinds of athlete equipment here in Albuquerque Indian School, such as basket ball, baseball, football and boxing outfit, etc. All these equipment take charge by Mr. J. E. Jones, and also teach us how to use it.

I think Albuquerque Indian school is the best school, better than any other Indian service. I tell why, because Albuquerque Indian School they are built me to be a man, and they are the ones development my mind and how to act and how to be a gentleman, and how to be polite and etc.

A. I. S. is the best school that's why I have been stay here for eight years now.

HUSKIE J. BURNSIDE.

Editorially, the State Tribune, a newspaper published daily in Albuquerque, said as follows:

POOR STUFF

John Collier, secretary of the Indian Defense Association, has issued a battery of heated charges since New Mexico became actively interested in a story to effect that Indian students in this State are being starved, maltreated, and poorly fed.

Collier has said:

That the governor's investigating committee was a whitewash at instigation of the Indian Bureau.

That the Hugh A. Carlisle Post of the American Legion is under influence of the Indian Bureau.

That middle Rio Grande conservancy is for exclusive benefit of the non-Indian settlers.

To which we say:

Let the Senate investigating committee come to New Mexico and learn for itself whether New Mexico is misrepresenting current conditions at Indian schools here. In hearings before that committee in Washington there has so far been no complaint of schools in this State. They have, in fact, been upheld as models for the service.

We have seen no statement from John Collier broadcasting this fact to the world. Yet it is one phase of the picture, a rather vital phase, we should say.

If the Hugh A. Carlisle Post is under influence of the Indian Bureau, then that influence has been so subtly exerted that few if any legionnaire has realized it.

Mr. Collier has amazing occult powers if at Washington he can read a simple telegram and determine therefrom that the sender and all his associates are webbed in the tentacles of the Indian Bureau.

The local Legion commander asked the editor of Good Housekeeping whether he would carry another article in event a Legion committee was able to disprove charges about New Mexico schools.

On the strength of this wire Mr. Collier broadcast to the world that the Legion is in cahoots with those who are stamping the Indian underground.

Mr. Collier has likewise broadcast a charge that middle Rio Grande conservancy does not benefit the Indian, that it is unfair. Congress has heard this charge several times, has investigated it, and disapproved it.

Anyone with a grain of cerebral tissue knows that tripling the area of fertile land of any people will benefit that people.

Cost of reclamation for Indians will be adjusted in the form of liens only on newly reclaimed lands, the liens never enforceable so long as the property remains in hands of the Indian.

That is the sort of arrangement that Mr. Collier is fighting. Why does he object to an economic project that promises to increase the wealth of his Indian wards; to heighten their comfort and prosperity; to help make them truly independent?

So far as New Mexico is concerned the facts are obscured by activities of two sets of extremists—those who declare smugly that the Indian is being too well treated and those who rant in season and out that the Indian is being slaughtered spiritually, economically, and physically.

The Indian will never secure justice from the covetous or from the professional uplifter. The public will never learn the truth from either of these groups. Unfortunately both of them are active.

We hope the Senate Indian Committee, in which we have confidence, will do a thorough job of investigating.

After reading these reports we ask, Why this attack upon the Department of the Interior and particularly why the attack on the manner in which the Indian children are treated in the boarding schools of my State? The motive for these attacks is questioned. The statements therein made have been treated as false by the committees investigating conditions in the State of New Mexico. [Applause.]

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I rise to reply to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], who spoke to us so entertainingly a few moments ago upon the question of the national-origins clause of the immigration law. This question has been before a committee in the other branch of Congress for consideration, and the newspapers of this morning say that yesterday that committee made its report, and the committee stood about as follows: Seven members of the committee were opposed to the Nye resolution and four were in favor of it. What is the Nye resolution? The Nye resolution is a resolution providing for another postponement of the national-origins clause. In 1924 the immigration law was passed, carrying with it the national-origins clause. In 1926 the Congress postponed the going into effect of that provision of the law, and in 1927 Congress again postponed it. The Nye resolution seeks to do the same thing this year. The report of the committee is adverse to that resolution; but, of course, no one knows what the future developments will be with respect to that legislation.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will be gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. This matter is of great interest and I am delighted that the gentleman is discussing it. Will the gentleman please develop somewhere in his address the situation which has grown out of the inability on the part of the administrative departments of the Government to set up the proper schedule for quotas on a proper basis, and whether the reply is not the setting up of a tentative schedule and putting that in force as the law?

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman is asking that question, because the recent hearings before the Senate committee have brought out in a convincing manner the fact that the propaganda that is going over the country to the effect that the national-origins clause is impracticable of operation and can not be put into effect is without foundation. Doctor Hill, in testifying before the committee during the last few days, said that the national-origins clause is more certain than the 1890 plan, and as far as whether the clause can be put into effect is concerned, from an administrative standpoint, all that need be done is to read the hearings before the Senate committee and see where Mr. White, of the Department of Labor, testifies that there will be absolutely no trouble in putting the national-origins clause into effect any more than there would be in putting the 1890 quota law into effect. I shall quote his testimony further along in this discussion.

I want to throw out one proposition for your consideration. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] fails to consider the fact that the national-origins clause was put into our law by reason of the statesmanship and mental acumen of the most distinguished statesman produced by Massachusetts since the days of Daniel Webster, and I refer to that incisive character, the late Senator Henry Cabot Lodge. He is the man who discovered the merits in the national-origins clause, and just as soon as he was able to launch it the idea was grasped by another great incisive mind in the United States, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and he now is the champion of this proposition.

What is meant by national origins? At the present time no Congressman, except one who was born abroad, is considered in the method of computing the quotas. No native-born Congressman is considered in the computation of the 1890 quota law. No one but foreign born are considered. This statesman, Senator Lodge, saw at once that it would not do in this great America of ours to allow immigration to be determined and based upon the foreign born only. No one is counted in the 1890 quota but the foreign-born.

How do they count them? The 1924 law grew out of the quota law of 1921. It is one of the most important pieces of legislation enacted in this country in the last generation. [Applause.] Why do I say that? If you will go back into the history of naturalization and immigration you will find that the Constitution of the United States nowhere says anything about immigration. It says that the Congress of the United States shall have the power to enact laws governing naturalization, but not a word about immigration. The law of immigration, the right of Congress to enact immigration laws, comes because of a judicial decision, a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Immigration has always been a live question. The 1921 law had a serious defect in it. We selected our immigrants under that law on this side of the ocean. This resulted in many immigrants being turned back after they had left their native country and paid for their transportation. In the 1924 law we changed the manner of selection, and now the process of selection is carried on by our consuls abroad. The 1924 law provides that the quotas should be 2 per cent of the foreign born in this country, as shown by the 1890 census. The object of the national-origins clause is to change that, and to base immigration on the whole people, both native born and foreign born. What could be more just and fair. Some one says that that is impracticable. It is not. The Census Department of the United States has gone to work and made computations, they have consulted the records, and now they have a system evolved which they say is safer and better and more certain than the 1890 census.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The purpose of the immigration law was to restrict immigration.

Mr. JENKINS. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is it not possible to restrict immigration under the quota? All you have to do is to reduce the percentage. If 2 per cent is too many, let us reduce it to 1 per cent. I would be in favor of that and I will vote for that. I am in favor of restricting immigration, and I would go even lower than that.

Mr. JENKINS. The trouble with that theory is that the gentleman wants to restrict immigration, basing it on the immigrants that come in. Why not restrict it on the people who are here? Let us take America as it is and strike a cross section of America as it is and say that people shall come into this country as that cross section indicates.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Take our present quota. Is there anybody—is there any class of immigrants coming in which is not desirable?

Mr. JENKINS. No; not any class taken as a nationality. There are many individual undesirables, but no plan will change that. That is a question of enforcement.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Are there any that now come in under the 2 per cent which the gentleman would think ought to be excluded?

Mr. JENKINS. No; my theory of the exclusion of immigrants is not based on the nationality of any people. Many people do base their opinion in reference to immigrants on their natural inclination. They consult their prejudices and not their judgment. But here is the proposition with me, if the gentleman wants to know my basis: It is not wise from a political or economic standpoint to bring into our country any great influx of any kind of people any more than it is safe to the vitality and political life and perpetuity of any other country to have brought into it any great numbers of people with backgrounds entirely different from those of the people of that country. If you would transfer into Italy a million of the finest Americans in the next year that country could not assimilate them, and the result might be very disastrous and would, I am sure, create an economic revolution if not a political revolution. The situation would be the same as to Great Britain or any other country. The political institutions of a country are the result of a long growth. A steady influx of immigration, if of the right kind and in a quantity that can be digested, will not upset the national equilibrium.

At the expense of repetition let me comment further on the law of 1924. Section (a) of this law provides that future quotas shall be 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born individuals of such nationality resident in the United States as shown by the census of 1890. The census of 1890 was selected for no special reason. The same arguments that would apply for the selection of that census would apply to the selection of the 1920 census. Many people who are opposing the national origins law would like to see the 1920 census selected, because there had been a much greater influx of immigration from southeastern Europe after 1890 than there was before that time. The basing of a quota on any particular census is not as serious as the basing of the quota upon the foreign born entirely, without any consideration of the native born.

The national-origins sections of the 1924 law provide a maximum of immigration at 150,000 per year. The 1890 provision admits 164,000. There is a reduction of 14,000. Under the national-origins plan the annual quota of any nationality for each year shall be a number which bears the same ratio to 150,000 as the number of inhabitants in the United States in 1920 having that national origin bears to the number of inhabitants in the United States in 1920. This number is not to be ascertained by tracing back the individual ancestry of each individual but upon statistics of immigration together with rates of increase of population and on all and any other authentic data that would tend to establish the national origin of the people. These quotas are all to be based on the last census, which was the census of 1920. Just how this is to be done is more easily understood than explained. The Census Bureau, which is one of the most efficient bureaus of the National Government and one which has been in existence in some form or another since the beginning of the Government, has assumed this task. There is no gainsaying the fact that Doctor Hill is America's most proficient student in all matters dealing with the population of the country.

There has been published in America by the American Council of Learned Societies a publication known as A Century of Population and Growth. This publication was prepared by the greatest students of the question in the country at that time. This document has been accepted by Doctor Hill, of the Census Bureau, for what it is worth and much other data of similar nature. As I understand it, the first step taken by the Census Bureau to ascertain the national origin of the population was to subtract from the total population of 1920 those classes excluded by the law of 1924 which were, principally, aliens ineligible to citizenship and the descendants of slave immigrants, together with the descendants of the Indians. After this subtraction there remained a total population of 94,820,915. The next step was to determine how many of these were direct descendants of those who were here in 1790 when the first census was taken. This was done by ascertaining from the 1920 census the number that were native born. They then found how many of those had native parents. They then went back to the census when these parents were born and found how many of them had native parents and continued this process back to the first census, which was 1790. They ascertained in that way that 41,288,570 of the white population in America in 1920 were descendants of the 3,172,444 that were enumerated in the 1790 census. The question then arose as to determine what was the national origin of those who were here in 1790. This was done by the application of many tests. Authorities on the German population in the country in 1719 were examined as well as authorities as to the population of the various other nationalities. Practically all these matters were gone into with great care by the American Council of Learned Societies. Much stress is laid by some on the fact that the muster rolls of the Revolutionary War showed a great preponderance of Irish in the Revolutionary War. Testimony by experts who have investigated this phase find that the muster rolls in themselves carried no great proving force for the muster rolls of the State of Massachusetts show that at different times in the Revolutionary War over 150,000 soldiers had enlisted from that State when as a matter of fact the total population of Massachusetts was only approximately 300,000. Some one testifying in the hearings before the Senate committee brought out the fact that investigation of the national origin of those who wrote the Constitution of the United States had been made and that about 80 per cent of the members of the Constitutional Convention were of English origin. Statistics taken from the Century of Population and Growth shows the number of people of the various nationalities in the several States when the first census was taken. I am inserting these statistics in the RECORD at this point.

It will be shown from these statistics that about 80 per cent of the people in the thirteen Colonies when the First Census was taken were English. It is well known to students of history that the great immigration from Germany and from the southern European countries had not set in at the time of the taking of the First Census. It is fair to assume that the same percentage of nationality that was shown to exist in the 1790 census would carry itself down to the 1920 census. In this way the 41,288,570 could be apportioned with comparative certainty.

The remaining 53,532,345 which represents the foreign born and those whose ancestors came since 1790 is more difficult of allotment. The plan adopted by the Bureau of Census seems to be very fair and seems to have worked out very satisfactorily. The department divided this total into three groups. At first it ascertained that according to the 1920 census 13,712,754 of this 53,532,345 were foreign born. It would therefore be a comparatively easy matter to classify this number. It found that 19,190,373 were children of immigrants. If the data was sufficient to ascertain the number that were children of immigrants it would be sufficient to determine the national origin of these children. There would remain therefore a total of 20,629,219 whose national origin would be more difficult of determination. They were placed in a classification for grandchildren of immigrants and were thus considered. Earlier censuses were examined as to the origin of those in this group and after careful and honest consideration fair and honest conclusions were arrived at. No one claims that this conclusion is mathematically correct but no one could successfully claim that it is not more accurate than the 1890 census would be when based purely upon foreign born within the country, and when arbitrarily selected. A total quota of 150,000 when taken in relation to the total population of the country only means 1 person for every 600 of population. In other words an error of 600 would only mean a change of 1 person in a quota. An error of 60,000 in population would only mean a change of 100 in a quota.

Further by way of explanation of what I have been trying to say I am taking the liberty of inserting a table and an explanation thereof by Doctor Hill of the Census Bureau:

Mr. HILL. I have explained how we determined the origin of the native stock by classifying it on the basis of the 1790 census.

Table C

Census year	Immigrant stock
	Immigrants	Children of immigrants	Grandchildren and later generations	Total
1890	9,121,867	9,794,347	5,752,578	24,668,792
1900	10,213,817	13,139,149	9,183,279	32,536,245
1910	13,345,545	15,907,074	14,378,163	43,630,782
1920	13,712,754	19,190,372	20,629,219	53,532,345

Coming now to the immigrant stock: As shown by Table C, which I have inserted in the record, we can divide immigrant stock into three component parts. It includes the immigrants themselves, as shown in the second column of Table C. It includes the children of immigrants, as shown in the third column of Table C, and it includes grandchildren and later generations. As regards immigrants themselves, the classification has been made by the census. There is no element of estimate there; the foreign born are classified in the census by country of birth; and as regards children of immigrants, the classification has also been made for us by the census. We do not have to estimate there. The element for which we do have to estimate consists of grandchildren and later generations, the classification of which by country of origin has not been made by the census.

Starting with the census of 1890 the number of grandchildren and later generations at that time was 5,752,578, as shown by this table. That forms only a comparatively small part of the total immigrant stock, about one-fifth of the total immigrant stock, so, as regards the origin of the immigrant stock in 1890, we may say it was four-fifths known and one-fifth unknown. I am emphasizing that fact to show that that portion for which you would have to make an estimate is relatively small, so that errors in the estimate would not affect the totals very much.

Coming back to the question, how shall we determine the country of origin of the grandchildren as enumerated in 1890, numbering 5,752,578? It is evident that the country of origin of the grandchildren as enumerated in 1890 would be determined by the immigration which came to this country prior to 1870. Why do I say prior to 1870? Simply for this reason—that the immigrants who came after 1870 could hardly have produced many grandchildren by 1890. They might have a few, of course, without appreciably affecting the total, but for the purposes of this computation I assume that it takes 20 years to produce a grandchild. So we assume that the distribution of the grandchildren by country of origin would be on the basis of the stream of immigration coming to this country prior to 1870. If, for illustration, the immigration was 33 per cent Irish and 37 per cent German, we estimate that the grandchildren would be 33 per cent Irish and 37 per cent German. These are not the actual percentages, but are given for illustration. So we determine or estimate the composition of grandchildren by country of origin on that basis, making some allowance for the different periods of immigration, because those immigrants who came in earlier would naturally have a larger proportion of grandchildren in 1890 than those that came in later.

Having done that we have completed our classification for 1890, the immigrants being classified by the census, the children of immigrants being also classified by the census, and the grandchildren and later generations being classified by the process I have described to you.

It was unfortunate that the quotas based upon the foreign-born census of 1890 gave to some countries a quota far out of proportion to that to which they were entitled. It is within the knowledge of every student of history that the immigration into the United States has changed from the standpoint of nationality of those coming as immigrants. In the early history of the country immigration was almost exclusively from northern Europe. When Germany reached its period of great growth and development following 1870 the German immigration became very heavy. Quoting from a speech made by myself in this House on June 7, 1926, it appears that immigration reached its maximum in 1907, when 1,285,349 persons came to our shores as immigrants. To show the gradual growth of immigration from 1820 to 1924, when the quota law was passed, and the restriction of immigration from that time forward, I am inserting table of statistics:

1820	8,385
1840	84,066
1854	427,833
1873	459,803
1881	669,431
1907	1,285,349
1914	1,218,480
1921	805,228
1923	522,919
1924	706,896
1925	294,314

Any census taken when the high tide of immigration was on from any particular country would, of course, be more than fair to that country and unfair to other countries. If the census of 1920 had been accepted, the quotas of the southern European countries would have been increased many times. Those who find fault with the national-origins plan have been asked repeatedly to furnish a better plan. As I have heretofore stated several times, the arbitrary acceptation of any census will be unfair to some nationalities.

Much propaganda has been scattered to the effect that the national-origins plan if put into effect will work a great hardship on those called upon to administer the law. This is purely propaganda. Assistant Secretary of Labor Mr. White, in his testimony in a public hearing before the United States Senate committee stated—when the 1924 act was put into effect it was not a noticeable disturbance or questioning of the quota from our department's standpoint. I doubt seriously if we would notice anything particularly if the national origins are put into effect—that is, from the Department of Labor's standpoint. We look upon this question as a scientific historical one to be left to the scientists and to the legislative bodies.

Further in his testimony he says:

Yes; the quotas as allotted are generally accepted by the various nationalities at the present time. I do not know as it will help you, but in my judgment any other quota announced by our Government would be equally as well accepted after a few years.

The national-origins plan will establish a permanent basis upon which future quotas can be fixed and can be justified. No census of foreign born only can furnish such a basis. If a proposition is fair, it can be justified and can be made to work. No discrimination should be practiced toward any nationality. If certain nationalities were favored by the selection of the 1890 census, those nationalities will, when they thoroughly understand the situation, be willing to accept any fair readjustment. Restriction of immigration is a permanent policy in our country now.

Those who favor the national origins are not asking for new legislation. They are only asking that the law passed after due deliberation by the Congress in 1924 be permitted to go into effect without further hindrance. When it shall have gone into effect and a fair permanent basis established for quotas the next step will be to determine whether those quotas should be restricted further, and if they are, that restriction should be on a fair basis so that no discrimination will be shown for or against the nationals of any country. America has achieved her greatness by having been able to amalgamate the various strains of blood into one great new strain. No nationality can claim all the credit for America's greatness. History records many instances where small nations have contributed mightily to the welfare of the world. Centuries ago it was asked in derision, "What good could come out of Nazareth?" To my mind the immigration question should be faced honestly and fairly, and it should be decided from the standpoint of what is best for America and those who are here rather than what is best for some other country and those who are yet to come. The national-origins provision is indorsed by every patriotic organization in America.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish it were possible to make an amendment to the immigration law to provide that the governor of the Bank of England could not come into the United States and direct our Federal Reserve Board as to its policy.

Due to the statement of the Federal Reserve Board of last week there were two outstanding results. First, the American public, by the reductions of prices on the stock exchange, suffered great losses. In industrial stocks alone, according to Dow-Jones averages, there was a drop of 20.53 for the last three days to Friday. Secondly, the flow of gold from Great Britain to the United States was checked, and the gold position of the Bank of England suffered no further decline.

Circumstances point to cooperation between our Federal Reserve Board and the authorities of the Bank of England to protect the British gold reserve. It has been protected at the expense of the American public. The Federal Reserve Board has countenanced the sale of Liberty bonds at a low figure with a purpose of curtailing American credit by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and it likewise has countenanced the purchase of eighty million sterling by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York for the purpose of stabilizing the pound sterling and checking the flow of gold to America.

Last week the Federal Reserve Board issued a warning against speculation and since issuing that warning has permitted the Federal Reserve Bank of New York to do a little speculating in Liberty bonds and pounds sterling.

An American governmental agency has deflated credit here to help credit in Great Britain. The Bank of England had lost £26,000,500 of gold in the last five months and is £6,000,000 below its level of a year ago. It is below the so-called Cunliffe minimum of £150,000,000 which London regards as the danger point. The most ominous note was sounded in the New York Times on February 11, 1929, that indicated that the Bank of England wished to arrange a credit in America. The New York World of to-day stated that Governor Norman of the Bank of England, instead of asking for credit, received, an agreement of cooperation to prevent the depletion of Great Britain's gold reserve.

So instead of Great Britain paying for financial help, American business through the tightening of American credit, will have to pay for it. The losers in the stock market for the last week have already paid dearly for our Government's altruism. The Declaration of Independence which was the first law of the land, had as its main object the removal of British economic and political control from the back of the struggling colonies.

Now that America is powerful, it is not our thought that we should have the economically unfortunate Great Britain loaded on the back of America to impede American progress.

We all have sympathy for conditions in Great Britain, but so has the banker for a farmer who needs financial help. However, his sympathy never loses sight of discount gain and interest. Suppose we picture the United States as an individual banker and Great Britain as an individual seeking financial help. The first thing Uncle Sam would say is, "What are your assets and what are you prepared to pay for assistance?" In the end, John Bull would be forced to part with some of his possessions in order to get gold from Uncle Sam to carry him over in emergency. Why do our Government officials then deal with Great Britain other than on a business basis? If we are going to keep the wolf from any door let it be kept from our own door. The Federal Reserve Board and the financiers who approve of its recent policy are very sympathetic with other peoples' money. The international bankers who like to help Great Britain never forget to obtain a profit through their sympathy. They are always good samaritans with a sizeable rake-off.

Evidently it is our duty to estop the Federal Reserve Board from using our funds to assist Great Britain. Great Britain needs credit. Let it get credit in the usual way and pay for it. I think we could gladly enter into an arrangement with Great Britain and take over some of her island possessions off our Atlantic coast which, as naval bases, threaten our security. Great Britain owns a large portion of the earth and an indidividual owning real estate and needing money must part with some of his holdings. Why should not a nation finance itself the same way? Of course, Europe will call us Uncle Shylock, but for centuries Great Britain has held a large part of the world in pawn and glorified in the situation. If bank loanings are to be curtailed against our business expansion it means unemployment in America. If capital is to be frightened against investing in business through the purchase of securities hard times will be inevitable. If hard times are on the way I trust that they stop at the boundaries of the United States. American capital, with the cooperation of American labor has made us the leader in prosperity. Capital and labor have led the way from soup kitchens in America to a public, to a big extent, composed of securities holders. The world has turned economically and America has taken its place in the financial sun.

The deflation in 1920 caused a serious depression. It followed a movement of gold to Europe when the Bank of England needed it. The Federal Reserve Board has a casual connection with the panic. I trust that some day there will be revealed the secret minutes of the Federal Reserve Board at that time during which western financiers protested against the raise in the rediscount rates. The farmers were told that they were overproducing and speculating just as investors to-day are told that they are overinvesting. The corollary of the Federal Reserve Board statement would be to warn business against mass production. Business would be told that there are too many automobiles, too much steel being produced, and that the mail-order business is getting too heavy.

The Federal reserve propaganda is to the effect that last week's statement was urged in behalf of American business. The strange thing about it is that, although the Senate had suggested such a policy for some time, that the Federal Reserve Board did not get excited about speculation until the visit of Montagu Norman, governor of the Bank of England. He seems to have more power with the Federal Reserve Board than American business or the Senate of the United States. We have not heard that the Federal Reserve Board consulted the United States Chamber of Commerce, the Secretary of Commerce, or any farm organization prior to the statement, but we do know that Mr. Montagu Norman worked out a cooperative arrangement with the Federal Reserve Board. I wish that some of the Members of Congress who have taken advantage of the situation to attack the New York Stock Exchange would look into the international aspect of recent developments.

The New York Stock Exchange is the one important element in our business life which has not a concomitant government guardian. Through it the farm regions of the country were opened up through its distribution of railroad securities by means of which the great railroad systems of the country were built. Through it the great industrial enterprises of the country which furnish a market for farm products were financed. Through it to-day new enterprises are being given their life blood. It has provided an economic regulation of capital and because government has not interfered it has expanded its facilities in the interest of the country's business.

The stock exchange has reduced the speculative element in security buying by its facilities for uniform and contemporaneous distribution of reliable information throughout the United States. Gambling consists in a wager on a future event. Speculation involves only the risk of property ownership. The best proof of the sincerity of the stock exchange has been the Wall Street protest against the statement of last week. Had the brokerage houses been purely gambling houses, they would have cause for rejoicing instead of protest in a declining market. The stock exchange helps business stabilization and also affords business valuable information. The call loan is a safe loan and provides ready funds for the purchase of securities of American business. As Mr. Simmons, president of the New York Stock Exchange, said, "The security collateral loans have been a sort of national surplus which could be drawn very effectively and beneficially." The call loan serves a very useful purpose in financing the passage of securities of issuer to investor. In actuality the call-loan totals are only a very small percentage of the market values of the securities listed on the stock exchange, and the idea that the surplus credit of the country is carrying on all the security merchandising is fallacious.

The visit of Governor Norman seems to bear out the warning of President Coolidge against foreign investments. I believe that this body, instead of being critical of our citizens who have confidence in the future of this country and so buy American securities, should scrutinize our foreign financial entanglements. I have asked that the Federal Reserve Board disclose its hand in connection with the British gold situation. We just finished a war brought about by secret diplomacy. Mr. Hearst has just disclosed a secret Franco-British naval pact that meant harm to America. Let us have some light on the dealings of the Federal Reserve Board. Congress, the fundamental governing body of the country, operates in the open. Let its creature, the Federal Reserve Board, give us details on its recent action. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back eight minutes.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I see that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK], a member of the election campaign expenditures committee, is present and I wish to inquire whether that committee has been examining primary campaign as well as election campaign expenditures?

Mr. BLACK of New York. The committee under the resolution has power to inquire into primary election and actually did it in a primary election case in Texas.

Mr. SCHAFER. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I hold in my hand a copy of the Capital Times, published at Madison, Wis., February 12, 1929, which contains an extensive editorial which quotes a report filed by Arthur R. Barry, special district attorney who conducted the John Doe inquiry into Wisconsin primary expenditures by Progressive candidates.

This report recommends the criminal prosecution of five Progressive leaders in Wisconsin for violation of the Wisconsin corrupt practices acts. I will not at this time read into the RECORD the entire editorial, but only such portion as refers to contributions to the La Follette Progressive Republican Club of Milwaukee, Wis., through Mr. Richard H. Lee of New York. I will not mention the names of candidates at this time, but will designate their names by blanks.

I hold in my hand some of the literature extensively circulated in my district by this La Follette Progressive Republican Club, in behalf of my La Follette Progressive primary opponent, who was defeated by an overwhelming majority. I have personally viewed at the secretary of state's office in Madison, Wis., the expense accounts filed by this La Follette Progressive Republican Club of Milwaukee, and from my personal knowledge know that, particularly with respect to $5,000 collected by Mr. Richard H. Lee, of New York, the corrupt practices acts of Wisconsin have been flagrantly violated.

It is my purpose in rising to-day to bring the matter to the attention of the House, and particularly to the attention of the Election Campaign Expenditures Committee of which the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] is a member, so that this committee can make an investigation of the receipts and expenditures in the primary campaign conducted by the La Follette Progressive Republican Club of Milwaukee.

I read now from the report filed by Arthur R. Barry, special district attorney who conducted the John Doe inquiry:

So far as we have been able to bring out the matter in the testimony, the contributions of Richard H. Lee amounted to $5,000. Mr. Lee's connection with the Wisconsin 1928 election is not only mysterious, dark, and foreboding, but spells and shows an outside interest, vicious in its nature, in Wisconsin politics, which in the future, if it can not be prevented or reached by State legislation, should call for national legislation, to avoid a repetition in the use of money in influencing the electorate in determining who should or should not be elected to office.

It appears that Richard H. Lee is a very prominent lawyer of the city of New York, listed in Martindale's Legal Directory, of the highest standing and ability, a man of great wealth, it appearing in one instance that while taking a cruise on his palatial yacht, he instructed his private secretary to forward $1,500 to the Milwaukee committee.

In the early part of July, 1928, Mr. Lee appeared at Madison, made himself acquainted with members of the committee and advised them that he held himself in readiness to assist the committee, particularly in the furtherance of the interest of candidates ——— and ———. Mr. Theodore Dammann, secretary of state, introduced him by telephone to Mr. G. A. Dick, chairman of the Milwaukee County Progressive Committee, and he later in turn presented Mr. Lee to Mr. Herbert L. Mount, secretary of the Milwaukee County Progressive Committee, to whom Mr. Lee pledged himself to send $5,000, which he did in several payments within three weeks thereafter.

To his credit Mr. Mount reported these moneys as received by him in his preprimary and postprimary financial statement, and stated them to be money collected by Richard H. Lee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SCHAFER. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania give me three minutes more?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. SCHAFER. I read further:

After the September primary Mr. Lee again comes to Wisconsin, calls on Mr. Mount at the Milwaukee Progressive headquarters, at which time Mr. Mount advised Mr. Lee that he would have to know the names of the men who made the contributions, and that they in turn would have to report their contributions to proper filing officers in Wisconsin.

Mr. Lee at that time told Mr. Mount he could charge up $1,800 to nine names then furnished. In passing, we will say it is peculiar that no addresses were mentioned for these names, and as to whether they are fictitious we are not advised.

Mr. Lee was repeatedly importuned by Mr. Mount to make report as to who contributed the other $3,200, but Mr. Lee willfully refused so to do, and continues to refuse to give the State of Wisconsin the information to which it is entitled. Mr. Lee has been advised that he has violated the corrupt practices act and given opportunity to make filing and he has refused to do so; and by so doing violated the statutes of the State of Wisconsin, the punishment of which constitutes a felony and therefore makes Mr. Lee extraditable, as he should be.

As to whether or not Mr. Lee, or whoever he may represent, contributed other money to the campaign, we are not advised, but it is peculiar, to say the least, that he, an utter stranger in Wisconsin, made contributions in the sum of $5,000 to the Milwaukee County campaign, and it is just as fair to presume that he did as to presume otherwise. Until we have his sworn testimony to the contrary the presumption that he did make additional and large expenditures, necessarily prevails.

Mr. Lee violated the statute in more than six particulars and the place of such violations being in Milwaukee County, he should there be prosecuted.

Mr. Chairman, the report of this special district attorney further shows a total expenditure in Wisconsin in behalf of the so-called Progressive candidates amounting to $132,833.16. I know of my own personal knowledge that all of the primary-election expenditures are not included. The report makes no mention of the many thousand copies of La Follette's magazine which were widely distributed from house to house. The issue so distributed was almost in its entirety confined to political campaign issues. The front page indicated a price of 10 cents per copy so that the total number of copies multiplied by 10 cents would represent the correct amount for campaign expense accounts.

I demand to know the source of the funds collected by Mr. Richard H. Lee, of New York, particularly since some of those funds were expended for political purposes in behalf of my primary opponent.

I request that the Election Campaign Expenditures Committee call Mr. Lee and such other witnesses as may be necessary to drag into the light the entire transaction which has been hidden in violation of the Wisconsin corrupt practices acts by Mr. Lee and the La Follette Progressive Republican Club, of Milwaukee.

As the late Senator La Follette often said: "Give the people light and they will find their way." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will use 15 minutes of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in closing the general debate, before starting to read the bill I would like to outline generally some of the provisions of the bill. In that way I think we can expedite the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having this bill in charge realized that this particular bill touches the Members of Congress more closely than any other bill that comes from our committee, and I can say truthfully that the members of the subcommittee approached the different projects in this bill without the slightest feeling of partisanship. Every member of the committee, both Republicans and Democrats, had only one idea in view, and that was to enact such legislation as would enable the legislative department of the Government to function at 100 per cent of efficiency. If you get a committee of Congress with but a single idea in view, it is usually possible to bring out a bill that is relieved from serious objection. That the bill is perfect we do not for one minute claim, but we do hope that it has no major defect or anything which would warrant a division in the committee or in the Congress.

The committee at the outset of its work had a very important matter to consider, and that was the question of the salaries of the employees of the House. The committee had appear before it various officers of the legislative department and Members of Congress, pointing out certain inequalities and injustices that are at present inflicted upon the working personnel. And there was a strong desire on the part of the committee to remedy those inequalities and injustices if possible. But the committee was brought face to face with this fundamental question: Have we the right under our rules to do that? Notwithstanding the desire to give relief was strong, the desire to comply with the rules was stronger, and this bill, therefore, does not contain one salary increase. It was not because we did not think increases were deserved. We know they are deserved in many cases. But we wished to proceed in a constitutional and orderly manner.

Mr. SANDLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. SANDLIN. The gentleman might explain that there are no salary increases except for those who come under the Welch Act.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. That was beyond our power to control and they are taken care of automatically, but the committee did not desire to usurp any prerogatives of the House. Therefore, we have not made any recommendations except those required of us by law.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is aware of the fact, is he not, that last year, by resolution of the House, there was a special committee appointed from the Committee on Accounts for the purpose of going over the question of the salaries of House employees and the relative salaries paid to the various persons. Did the gentleman or his committee consult them or take that matter into consideration at all?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from New York, that the members of the committee did not consult with the Committee on Accounts but they did have that matter under consideration in weighing the facts of the case. It was the opinion of the Appropriations Committee that no committee as now constituted has the right under our rules to entirely take up this question, and for that reason they unanimously went on record as favoring the appointment of a joint committee, consisting of three Members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker, and three Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Vice President, to go into this whole question of the revision of salaries and make a recommendation either by bill or otherwise at the next ensuing session of the Seventy-first Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman think we would be any further ahead by having a joint committee than to take care of the situation as it exists in the House at the present time? Personally I believe there are a great many inequalities, but I question whether we would get any further through a joint committee than we would by taking care of the situation as it exists in the House by the appointment of a House committee.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I would say in reply to the gentleman from New York that I undoubtedly believe we would get further ahead. I believe it is the only way of solving this question, and unless we take this course we are going to be guilty of further acts of favoritism; we are going to pick out here and there, year by year, certain deserving cases—I will not call them cases of favoritism—and deal with them piecemeal, and in doing that we will leave many other cases, equally deserving, without a remedy, and merely be legislating in the line of favoritism. That is something the members of the committee deplore and that we do not want to be guilty of.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. We have done that in a number of instances, have we not?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. We have, and the time has come for it to stop.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Why not put these other employees on an equal basis? I know of several employees here, some on that side and some on this side, who are not getting the salaries which should be paid to them, and I ask the gentleman why not take up those cases now, as suggested by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that the minute we try to do that it is subject to a point of order, and year after year it will be subject to a point of order.

Mr. ABERNETHY. But I do not believe points of order would be made, and I believe we should act now. In my opinion many of these salaries should be raised proportionately.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman misunderstood what I had in mind. I did not mean to take it up now without legislation authorizing it. I was trying to find out from the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he thought we had better take this up as a House matter instead of having it taken up as a joint matter with the Senate, because, as a matter of fact, as everyone knows, they always pay more liberal salaries at the other end of the Capitol than we pay here.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman any assurance that this joint commission will have any success in dealing with the body at the other end of the Capitol?

Mr. SNELL. That is the point I had in mind.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman any assurance that would lead him to think that in case such a committee is appointed that the representatives on the part of the Senate will be willing to meet us half way and try to fairly adjust the salaries of employees doing comparable work in the two branches of Congress?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I will say to the majority floor leader that I have no assurance of that; but based upon my past experience in life it is my belief and my hope that a joint committee of the two Houses, sitting down around a common table and taking a comprehensive survey of the whole situation and endeavoring to deal fairly with the situation in its entirety, will accomplish greater results than would be the case if it is dealt with piecemeal year after year by taking care of a few cases.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to an instance which occurred right here on the floor of the House yesterday, when the question of giving to the President of the United States two additional secretaries at $10,000 each, was under consideration. That was subject to a point of order, but there was not a man on this side who objected to it and there was not a man on that side who objected to it.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I made a point of order, and the House put it in the bill in the regular way. I objected to its going into the bill without the affirmative vote of the House. I do not think it ought to have gone in and would have been very glad to have stopped it.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] certainly took advantage of his rights and called the attention of the House to the fact that it was not in order.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. We can not do that in this appropriation bill, because one point of order would defeat it.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I know of deserving men here who are working and I see them standing right here listening to this debate. There are such men on both sides of the Chamber, and I want to say to the gentleman that I make no distinction. I stood up here at one time and made a plea for a man who was sick and could not defend himself, who was on the other side of the Chamber; and as an humble Member of this House I do appeal to the gentleman that there are employees here who are faithful and it does not make any difference on which side of the aisle they are, they are always at our beck and call, and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes; and I will say to the gentleman that that was the very attitude of the committee. There is no desire and no intention to discriminate on either side of the aisle.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The gentleman has the power. He is the head of a very important subcommittee, and I am speaking now not so much for this side, because I do not know just how it affects them, but I do know there are employees here who have served faithfully here year after year with the cost of living increasing all the time, and the Congress of the United States, through its own membership, has increased its own salaries. Take the salaries of the clerks, for instance. You have increased salaries here and there of men right on the floor here where you have taken up single instances. I will not name them, because the gentleman knows them, and, as the gentleman pointed out a while ago, we have numerous deserving employees, and if we wait for a joint committee, nobody knows at what time we will get to it. It does seem to me there ought to be some method by which this can be done, particularly when the question has been raised by the chairman of the Committee on Rules and the debate has been entered into by the majority leader. It seems to me we might get together and give these employees the amounts to which they are properly entitled.

Mr. SANDLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SANDLIN. I simply want to make this observation: I do not know whether the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY] was present when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WELSH] opened his remarks or not, but this is very much like the two darkies who both agreed that potatoes would grow better in sandy land and argued about it all day.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The trouble about that is that we have not planted any potatoes and we are not raising any potatoes.

Mr. SANDLIN. I will say further to the gentleman that this committee has no authority to legislate, and as a member of the Appropriations Committee I have always objected to the Appropriations Committee bringing in legislation here whenever it was possible to avoid it. I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY] that there are many inequalities existing in the salaries of the employees of the House, and it is the earnest desire of the full committtee, as much as it is the desire of the gentleman from North Carolina, that the salaries be adjusted; and the only thing in dispute is how to adjust them.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman does not believe that the proper way to adjust them would be to begin on the floor of the House to add increases here and there?

Mr. SANDLIN. I do not. I think it ought to be threshed out by a committee; and the reason I am in favor of the establishment of a joint commission is because there has already been introduced in the Senate a resolution—I think by Senator ROBINSON—that provides for the raising of the salaries of the clerks of committees, as well as other salaries; and we feel, as Members of the House, that if salaries are going to be raised over there that the employees of the House who are doing the same kind of work ought to be treated with the same consideration as the employees of the Senate; and therefore we believe that a joint committee could get together and thresh out these matters and not have these inequalities.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. May I ask the gentleman from Louisiana if it is contemplated to increase the salary of the police force of the Capitol, which is now about $112 a month? How can we expect a man to support a family on that salary?

Mr. SANDLIN. That matter was mentioned. I do not see how they can live on that salary. I could not, and I do not suppose the gentleman from Wisconsin could, and certainly I would not want him to.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I want to ask a question in regard to this discussion. When the gentleman who has just taken his seat said he did not believe this was the proper way to approach this question, I want to ask if it is not important enough to be approached in some way; and if it can not be approached in a more appropriate way, is there serious objection to its being approached in this way? I should like to add to my question, as an illustration, the way in which the Clerk of this House is being treated—a man of great and responsible duties under the Constitution, who has in charge the organization of every House of Representatives.

Mr. ABERNETHY. And the Doorkeeper.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I might add the Doorkeeper and the Sergeant at Arms. I might also add the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, a man whom you could not duplicate in years of endeavor. I am speaking of these men just as illustrations.

Mr. SANDLIN. I thought the gentleman was going to ask me a question.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I am coming to the question I want to ask. The Members saw fit to raise their own salaries to $10,000 a year and neglected to raise those salaries which were measured in responsibility by the amount which was paid to the Members. Here is the Sergeant at Arms, charged with the responsibility of enormous sums of money, greatly increased by the amounts which have been added to the salaries of the Members. The responsibility of the Clerk has been increased in the same way; and I am asking my good friend across the way from Louisiana if it is not the proper thing to do the right thing at any time?

Mr. SANDLIN. Is the gentleman asking me that question or the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY]?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I am asking the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the question?

Mr. SANDLIN. The gentleman has asked me to answer the question. I am sorry I failed to make myself understood, because our position is this: I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD] that this matter should be adjusted, and I have said so. I agree that many inequalities exist, but I want to correct them in the proper and legal way. I do not want to come in here with an appropriation bill and have various Members get up on the floor and condemn and criticize, in many instances justly, the Committee on Appropriations for writing legislation on an appropriation bill. Therefore I want to say that this committee, which will be created under the proposed amendment by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, will do the very thing that the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from North Carolina have so eloquently advocated on the floor.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I was wondering if this joint committee would act in my lifetime or yours.

Mr. SANDLIN. You must take that up with the joint committee. I am hopeful, if the gentleman from North Carolina is one of the committee, that they will act at once.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I would act right now.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. If the rule against legislation on an appropriation bill is to be invoked, why shut your eyes to the fact that these bills are full of it? I am told that three-quarters of the agricultural bill which comes from the Agricultural Committee is not supported by legislation.

Mr. SANDLIN. The gentleman is incorrect.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. My authority is an expert in the Congressional Library.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from Ohio can always exercise his right to make a point of order against legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Are these gentlemen, who are speaking, for the bill or against it?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I understand that we can make a point of order against this proposition, but I am not going to do it. I am sure that nobody else will. I hope the gentleman will have the thorough cooperation not only of the committee but the majority leader, the chairman of the Rules Committee, and I am sure there will be no objection made on the part of anybody so that the employees can get a proper stipend for the amount of work they do. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will be one of the committee.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Did I understand the gentleman to say that there was no legislative committee of the House that has jurisdiction over this matter?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I have so stated. I do not know of any other way in which this can be brought about. Now, this proposition is going to be offered as section 4, if there is no objection to it; and I want to give the House ample warning of the proposition.

Now, as to the bill, I would like to have gone more fully into the provisions of the bill than I will on account of the lateness of the hour. There are many points of interest in the bill. The bill takes up the power plant, and it will be of interest to know that conditions at the power plant are very fine. It is one of the model institutions of the country, and you will be interested to read the testimony brought out at the hearings as to the detail and the management of that wonderful plant.

It takes up the Congressional Library, and that is one of the outstanding institutions of the world. It will be interesting to see the way the Library is conducted and the efficiency of the manner in which it is run and the high regard in which it is held throughout the educational world.

You will be interested to know something about the Botanical Garden, the present condition of the work, and the future development that is in contemplation.

The Public Printer also comes under the jurisdiction of this bill, and Members will be interested to know that there are upward of 4,100 employees there, and that there is no labor trouble. Everything is running harmoniously and it is, I am glad to say, the greatest printing plant in the world. There is not a particle of friction.

The Clerk of the House appeared before us and said that in his experience, which extends over a long period of years, the work of the department is running more smoothly than it ever has before.

The Architect of the Capitol also had a very interesting story to tell the committee about the activities of his department.

I shall not take time to go into the details of the bill, because they are all here, but I wish you gentlemen would take the trouble to read the testimony that was produced before the committee. This is your own house that we are putting in order. It is something that concerns you, and your committee wants you to know what is going on.

You will also be interested to know that the various heads of your departments were asked emphatically whether they had any suggestions to make that would improve their efficiency or bring about a reduction in the expense of administration. They all felt that they had an opportunity to express themselves fully, and they did express themselves fully and indicated that they had the complete cooperation of the subcommittee and of the entire Congress in their desire to function as nearly perfect as possible.

I shall not take the time now to go further into the details of the bill. The bill carries an appropriation of upward of $18,000,000 for these various departments. We have kept well within the estimates. We have not increased the pay roll at all except as we were required to do under the provisions of the Welch Act. We have tried to give you the results of the best and most painstaking inquiry that we could make, and we hope that you will support us in what we have tried to do. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall take only a few minutes to refer to the discussion that took place a short time ago on the salary question. When the Welch Act was passed, the Botanic Garden employees and the employees of the Library of Congress were taken care of. They come under the provisions of that act. The salaries of the employees of both of those departments were increased in accordance with the provisions of that act. The act, however, does not apply to the employees of the Capitol at all, and they get no benefit from it. That is one of the matters that we think should be disposed of by this joint committee. Of course, the proposed amendment for the appointment of this joint committee is legislation itself. I call the attention of those gentlemen who are anxious that this matter be adjusted to the fact that it is legislation, and hope that they will not in this instance object to that legislation on an appropriation bill.

It was the desire of the committee to see to it that no injustices were done to the employees of the Capitol. I, for one, feel that their salaries ought to be put on an equality with the salaries of people doing like work in the other departments of the Government. At the present time a great many of them are not receiving the salaries that they should. Then, again, on this side of the House there are employees who are doing the same kind of work and more of it than others at the other end of the Capitol who are receiving larger salaries. As Members of the House, I think we should, as soon as we can get machinery set up, see to it that these inequalities are adjusted. The committee has given a great deal of thought to this matter. Last year I offered amendments in the committee to increase some salaries, and certain increases were written into the bill. They were stricken out on a point of order.

The same thing would probably happen again if I were to attempt it. The only proper way and the only just way in which this can be handled is by the appointment of a joint committee, and then any Member of the House or any employee of the House who knows or feels there is inequality existing can present the matter here proposed to this committee and it can be adjusted.

In conclusion, let me say that I indorse the bill; and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], the other Democrat on the subcommittee, also indorses the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further debate, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDEX TO STATE LEGISLATION

To enable the Librarian of Congress to prepare an index to the legislation of the several States, together with a supplemental digest of the more important legislation, as authorized and directed by the act entitled "An act providing for the preparation of a biennial index to State legislation," approved February 10, 1927 (U. S. C. Supp. I, p. 4, secs. 164, 165), including personal and other services within and without the District of Columbia (including not to exceed $2,500 for special and temporary service at rates to be fixed by the librarian), travel, necessary material and apparatus, printing and binding incident to the work of compilation, stationery, and incidentals, $33,280, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1929.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman of the subcommittee state what progress is being made in the preparation of this index, how they are going to carry it on and bring it up to date?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Doctor Putnam said they were doing what they possibly could, but could not possibly bring it up to date, that it is considerably in arrears, and asked for extra help to do that work, which is very much needed.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does not the gentleman think one of the most valuable functions of the Library is to have things brought up to date for the benefit of the Congress?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. My experience is there is a lot of antiquated stuff in the Library, probably kept as relics, but I do not think they are useful for any other purpose than to clutter up the Library; certainly they are not serviceable. Not long ago I called for a copy of the constitution of my State, and I think they sent one of the first copies, issued about 1878 or 1881. There have been numerous amendments to the Texas Constitution since that time, and the old edition was absolutely unreliable; it was the sort of book which the West Publishing Co., or one of the other publishing houses, would almost give away to stack the shelves of a young lawyer. What is the use of having that sort of stuff for the use of Members of Congress, when you ought to have late editions of volumes relating to State and National Governments?

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I will say the subcommittee unanimously agreed with the gentleman. Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, who is on the subcommittee, took up that matter with Doctor Putnam in the hearings, as you will find on page 117 of the testimony. I can assure the gentleman that the committee, Doctor Putnam, the librarian, and the subcommittee are in accord on this matter.

Mr. BRIGGS. Are they going to weed out some of the old stuff and have it modern and have somebody get later books so you can have them available when they are needed by Members of Congress? I had the experience not long ago in asking the Library to send over an index of the United States Supreme Court decisions. It seems there were only two copies, one in the Supreme Court section and one in the Congressional Library, and they did not want to let either one out. I said that I thought that the Congressional Library was run for the benefit of Members of Congress. Finally, after I got enough officers of the Library busy, I got a volume and found what I wanted and sent it back again.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. I think we are all in accord in reference to what the gentleman says.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read, as follows:

After line 5, page 40, add the following:

"SEC. 4. A joint committee of Congress is hereby created, consisting of three Senators, to be appointed by the Vice President, and three Members of the House of Representatives of the Seventieth Congress, who are Members elect to the Seventy-first Congress, to be appointed by the Speaker. It shall be the duty of the joint committee to investigate and report to the first session of the Seventy-first Congress, by bill or otherwise, what adjustments, if any, should be made in the numbers and compensation of the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including joint committees, joint commissions, and other joint services of the two Houses, and of the office of the Architect of the Capitol."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, before a vote is had on the amendment, I wish to say that I shall not make a point of order against this amendment because I hope that it will bring some degree of success in fairly adjusting the salaries as between the House employees and the Senate employees. For that reason I am willing to see this amendment go into the bill and become a law. Before passing it, however, I should like to call attention to the fact that the House has heretofore made some very earnest efforts to adjust the salaries of its employees, but they did not all prove successful. One of these was the effort to adopt a report made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], from the Committee on Accounts, or a special committee composed partly, if not entirely, of members from the Committee on Accounts, which undertook to deal with the problem of fairly adjusting the salaries of the employees of this House. Much time, thought, and careful study were expended in the preparation of the report submitted by the Underhill committee, and it was certainly a proposed step in the right direction, but the step was not taken.

I hope that the amendment offered by the acting chairman of the subcommittee may eventually yield results, and that we may possibly some time hereafter have a more equitable adjustment of the salaries of employees doing similar or comparable work whether it be at one end or the other of the Capitol.

Mr. BRIGGS. What time is contemplated for the report to be made?

Mr. TILSON. At the first session of the next Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SNELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 17053) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DEATH OF FORMER REPRESENTATIVE JACK BEALL

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday morning the information reached Washington that Hon. Jack Beall, for 12 years a Member of this House, had passed away at his home in Dallas. Though Mr. Beall had not been a Member of this body for a long time, having voluntarily retired 14 years ago, he is remembered by his old associates with an affection and an admiration which only the highest qualities of character and ability can inspire. When I came here as a Member from the State at large Mr. Beall was representing my home district, the district which I now have the honor to represent. In the intimacy of that association I came to know him and to love him. It was impossible to know Jack Beall and not to love him and to admire him. He was a great friend. He knew the meaning of friendship as but few know it. He was a great statesman and a great man. A man of deep sympathy, gentle and tender, honest and courageous, with a mentality clear and profound, he was an able champion, in office and in private life, of that which is right.

COMMEMORATIVE POSTAGE STAMPS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of New York, addressed to the Postmaster General, requesting an issue of 100,000,000 2-cent postage stamps commemorative of the Sullivan campaign of 1779 in New York and Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Following is the resolution referred to:

Albany, February 11, 1929.

Whereas the legislature and governor have made an appropriation for suitable exercise and historic monuments to observe the Sullivan Sesquicentennial:

Resolved (if the assembly concur)—

1. That the Hon. Harry S. New, Postmaster General of the United States, be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be issued 100,000,000 postage stamps, of the denomination of 2 cents each, commemorative of the Sullivan campaign of 1779 in New York and Pennsylvania.

2. That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Postmaster General of the United States and to the Senators and Members of Congress from the State of New York, properly authenticated by the clerks, respectively, of the senate and assembly.

SENATE

FRIDAY, February 15, 1929

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who remainest the same though all else fades, who changest not with our changing moods, lead us to a clearer vision of the light that knows no shadow of turning that we stray not in folly away. Thou knowest our frame, Thou rememberest that we are but dust; save us, therefore, from whatever anguish or confusion we have brought upon ourselves, for at our faintest cry of need the valleys are exalted, the mountains and hills are made low, and the crooked paths of life are straightened.

Bind together with cords of love the hearts of these Thy servants, that the spirit of mutual understanding and deeper fellowship may be reflected in their corporate efforts.

Look with pity, we beseech Thee, upon those who through love's vigil have watched and waited and have been brought to the valley of shadow. Fold them closer to Thy mercy's breast and grant them surcease from every sorrow for the sake of Him who died that we might live, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE IN SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have a letter from the Hon. J. A. Tolbert, district attorney for the western district of South Carolina, a letter from the Hon. H. H. Watkins, judge of the western district of South Carolina, a letter from the Hon.

Ernest F. Cochran, judge of the eastern district of South Carolina, and a synopsis of opinions, decrees without opinions, jury trials, and so forth, in the eastern district of South Carolina presided over by Judge Cochran, all of which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and ordered to lie on the table. They have reference to the bill providing for additional judges in the State of South Carolina.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
UNITED STATES ATTORNEY,
WESTERN DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Greenville, S. C., February 2, 1929.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: I have just received the marked copy of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Wednesday, January 30, 1929, and have read with considerable interest the effort now being made by you to secure the passage of a bill providing for the appointment of an additional Federal judge for South Carolina.

I certainly hope that your efforts will be successful in regard to having an additional Federal judge appointed for this State. If you can succeed in having your bill passed providing for the appointment of an additional Federal judge in this State, you will not only provide a means to improve the congested conditions of the dockets in the two United States district courts now but you will accomplish a permanent and lasting benefit for the State of South Carolina.

With kindest regards and best wishes.

As ever,

J. A. TOLBERT.

JUDGE'S CHAMBERS, UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
Anderson, S. C., February 13, 1929.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your letter of February 8 regarding the bill for an additional judge for South Carolina, I beg to advise you that in this district the urgency for such provision has constantly increased since my former letters to you and Congressman DOMINICK. Urgent matters are being delayed in spite of every effort to dispose of them, and the growth of business, particularly of corporate enterprises in this section of the country, indicates a large and constant increase of civil business. The added activities of prohibition agents promises a considerable increase in the criminal business. As heretofore stated, I am unable to understand how the merits of the case are affected or can be determined by a comparison with other districts. The logic of such argument would necessarily be that scandalous delays and injustices to litigants in one section of the country would furnish a reason for permitting such a condition in another section. Such course would not only weaken the prestige of the courts and the confidence of the public but would also display a disregard of the obligation of the Government to furnish to every citizen that prompt redress of grievances and assertions of legal rights which unquestionably the Government owes to its citizens. I think you are already aware of the fact that the conditions in Judge Cochran's district are more acute even than in my own and that both of us have gone to the limit of our capacity and are still doing so to meet the situation.

Yours very truly,

H. H. WATKINS,
United States District Judge.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
EASTERN DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Aiken, S. C., February 11, 1929.

Hon. COLEMAN L. BLEASE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I received your letter of the 8th instant, inquiring whether my views were the same in reference to the necessity for an additional judge for South Carolina as they were when I wrote the letters which were cited in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

When called upon by the Department of Justice and by Congressman DOMINICK for the House Judiciary Committee on several occasions for my views upon this matter, I wrote them fully and sent certain data which I thought amply sustained my views. I also have in my annual reports for the judges' conference called attention to the same matter. Having on more than one occasion thus called the matter to the attention of the proper authorities, I have felt that my duty to the people of this district and persons having business in my court had been performed in that respect, and that any further suggestion on my part of the necessity for another judge would appear as if I were complaining of the burden which has been upon me for the last five years. For that reason, when the matter came up in the Senate, I did not feel like writing you or Senator SMITH, your colleague from this State, and thus appear to be obtruding my views.

However, since you have made the inquiry, I have no hesitation in saying that my views have not changed and that I am more than ever convinced that there is a real necessity that I receive some assistance if those having business in this court are to receive the consideration that they are entitled to under the law. The last report of the Attorney General will give you the figures of the number of cases, etc., for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928; but, as I have had occasion more than once to say, mere figures are misleading. The question is the nature of the work and the time required for study and consideration. At the end of the last fiscal year I had the clerk prepare a synopsis of the contested matters which required hearing, study, and consideration, and I inclose you a copy of it. I think you will agree with me that this shows that there is more work than one man ought to be required to do; and this does not take into consideration the large amount of administrative and routine business which requires, of course, a great deal of time. As to the number of opinions filed by me during the year, a word of explanation should be made, in order that the figures may not be misunderstood. You will find that I filed 63 opinions altogether. Twenty-four of these opinions, while they required some consideration, were not of such a serious nature; but 39 of them were cases and matters involving serious study and consideration and required considerable time.

One difficulty in this district is the large number of contested matters, and especially the criminal jury trials. You will no doubt recall that last January I tried one criminal case which took a little over five weeks. There are other cases growing out of those same transactions which will take a number of weeks for trial. Of course, we hope that such long cases are not likely to occur again in the near future; but the fact remains that the nature of both the criminal and civil business is now such that it requires more time for the disposition thereof than formerly.

There was a slight decrease in the civil business last year, and a slight increase in the criminal business; but since the last fiscal year there has been a tremendous increase in the criminal business, and the volume of civil business continues to be steady. The figures since the last fiscal year are not yet available.

Owing to economic conditions and other factors, the situation in this district is somewhat peculiar. I have very definite views as to the causes of this peculiar situation; but it would unduly expand this letter for me to undertake to set forth these matters in detail. My view is that the situation can not continue indefinitely without serious prejudice to the public interests, and that some steps should be taken in the near future to relieve the present embarrassing condition.

Respectfully,

ERNEST F. COCHRAN,
United States District Judge.

IMMIGRATION QUOTAS BASED ON NATIONAL ORIGINS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I present a communication from the Associated American Immigration Societies of Massachusetts, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, together with the accompanying paper, treated in the nature of a petition, and referred to the Committee on Immigration. I might add that the communication expresses my views on the subject.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASSOCIATED AMERICAN IMMIGRATION SOCIETIES OF MASSACHUSETTS,
Roxbury, February 12, 1929.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Find inclosed copy of article bearing on national-origins issue from the pen of one of the country's most brilliant journalists, Mr. John Bantry, of the Boston Post, under date of Monday, February 11, 1929. It vividly portrays the sentiment of thousands of American citizens who are thoroughly convinced that no satisfactory or accurate estimate can be arrived at in allotting immigration quotas based on national origins as of the census returns of 1790. Furthermore, we vigorously resent the veiled insinuations manifested in the arguments presented by the legislative agent of the American Legion at a recent hearing of your Senatorial Immigration Committee.

Our people in Massachusetts and the Nation leave their loyalty and patriotism to the sane and sober judgment of unprejudiced and historic facts. From the earliest perils which beset this Nation, down to the recent conflict, they never wavered, and even in that tragic hour we had the high honor of receiving the personal commendation of that great exponent of Democratic ideals, Woodrow Wilson.

Therefore, we respectfully urge of your honorable body an equitable adjustment of pending immigration legislation, to the end that all races and peoples coming to our hospitable shores shall have renewed confidence and hope in democratic institutions, free from prejudice and discrimination such as the proposed national-origins amendment would impose on a vast majority of loyal and devoted citizens of this Republic.

Respectfully yours,

RICHARD J. DWYER, President.
JOHN J. FOLEY, Secretary.

[From the Boston Post, Monday, February 11, 1929]

NEW PHASE TO "ORIGINS" ISSUE—NOW CLAIM "SLACKER" RACES SHOULD BE PUNISHED—IGNORE HOOVER REPEAL DEMAND

By John Bantry

President-elect Hoover, in his speech of acceptance, went squarely on record in favor or repealing the national-origins clause of the present immigration act. By so doing he pledged the Republican Party to repeal.

The House of Representatives, by a sizable majority, is already on record against the national-origin clause. A vote on the matter in the Senate has been persistently blocked, though it is said that a majority of the Senate is ready to repeal the clause.

An impressive amount of public opinion, as represented by leading newspapers, has indicated in favor of repeal. Only one Member of the Senate, Senator REED of Pennsylvania, has defended the national-origins clause publicly. Herbert Hoover, when Secretary of Commerce, opposed the whole scheme of national origins vigorously. Indeed, Mr. Hoover furnished the most impressive arguments against it.

FILIBUSTER AGAINST REPEAL

Yet to-day a handful of men, led by Senator REED of Pennsylvania, are conducting what amounts to a filibuster against national-origins repeal. If the matter is not acted upon in the Senate before March 4 next, President Hoover, against his will, must issue a proclamation before July 1 putting the national-origins clause into operation. Thus a little group of propagandists will, by a parliamentary trick, succeed in fastening on the American people an obnoxious and unworkable system of restricting immigration.

The oponents of national origins are not opposed to the restriction of immigration. They would not oppose a bill to restrict it altogether or to cut the present total quota in halves. But they do object to a system of restrictions based on the falsification of American history. The defenders of national origins admit that it is directed against immigration from Ireland. By an alleged "census" of their own they pretend to show that practically no persons of Irish blood were residents of the United States until many years after the Revolution, and that not until between 1840 and 1850 was there any noticeable influx of immigration from southern Ireland.

IRISH NAMES IN REVOLUTION

The presence of countless Irish names in Revolutionary history and on the muster rolls of the Colonies is flouted on the ground that these persons were "Scotch-Irish" and not real Irish.

Therefore, by this amazing misreading of history the propagandists for national origins are able to cut the quota for the Irish Free State nearly in halves and to double the quota from Great Britain and northern Ireland.

The countries which suffer a sizable cut in immigration quotas under the national-origins clause are the Irish Free State, Germany, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and France. The cut for Sweden, Denmark, and Norway is greater than in the case of the Irish Free State.

COUNTRIES THAT WILL GAIN

The countries which will gain materially from the national-origins quotas are Great Britain and northern Ireland, Holland, Italy, Poland, Russia.

Northern Europe would lose in all a little more than 11 per cent of its present immigration quota, while southern Europe would gain 25 per cent.

With this in mind, the significance of an amazing statement made before the Senate immigration committee at the hearing on Saturday by John Thomas Taylor, representing the American Legion, is apparent.

INFERENCE ON "SLACKERS"

Mr. Taylor placed the Legion on record for the national-origins clause by declaring that this was the only way in which those races which were "slackers" in the World War could be kept out. The plain inference of his statement was that the people of Irish, German, Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, and French blood were the chief "slackers" in America, since these are the races which are to be punished by a large cut in the quota.

That statement attacks the patriotism of millions of Americans in whose veins the blood of these races runs. The ranks of the American Legion contain more men of such descent than any other six races. Yet the spokesman for the American Legion brands them as belonging to the chief "war slacker" elements in the community.

AN ATTACK ON PATRIOTISM

The issue now becomes something vastly more far-reaching than that of willfully distorting the colonial and Revolutionary history of America. It is an attack on the present-day patriotism of the men of Irish, German, Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, and French blood. It is a bold declaration that the people of these mother countries are not as eligible as those from other countries, because they have a poor record for American patriotism.

Thus the issue is drawn. Unless a mighty protest is registered at once this discreditable and degrading measure will be put in force within a few months, forced by a trick on a President who has denounced it repeatedly and who solemnly asked for its repeal.

Can anything be more disgraceful?

A bill (S. 5379) to authorize the disposition of certain public lands in the State of Nevada (Rept. No. 1759); and

A bill (H. R. 14457) validating certain conveyances heretofore made by Central Pacific Railway Co., a corporation, and its lessee, Southern Pacific Co., a corporation, involving certain portions of right of way, in and in the vicinity of the city of Lodi, and near the station of Acampo, all in the county of San Joaquin, State of California, acquired by Central Pacific Railway Co. under the act of Congress approved July 1, 1862 (vol. 12, U. S. Stat. L. 489), as amended by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864 (vol. 13, U. S. Stat. L. 356) (Rept. No. 1769).

A bill (H. R. 14981) for the relief of Josephine Laforge (Sage Woman) (Rept. No. 1775);

A bill (H. R. 15700) for the relief of the heirs of William W. Head, deceased (Rept. No. 1776); and

A bill (H. R. 15724) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange certain lands within the State of Montana, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 1777).

WASHINGTON (D. C.) AIRPORT

Mr. VANDENBERG. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 216) to establish a joint commission on airports, and I submit a report (No. 1758) thereon.

The joint resolution provides for the appointment of a joint committee of the House and Senate to consider the Washington, D. C. airport problem. I desire to say in this connection that, in the judgment of the committee, this is not an effort to delay the project in any degree but, on the contrary, in our judgment it is the surest and quickest method of getting adequate relief.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

CAPT. BENJAMIN MENDEZ

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5749) authorizing the presentation of the distinguished flying cross to Capt. Benjamin Mendez. As the time is short, I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I believe there will be no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to present the distinguished flying cross to Capt. Benjamin Mendez in recognition of his extraordinary achievement in linking the continents of South and North America by an aerial journey, by seaplane, from the northern Atlantic coast of the United States of America to Giradot, Colombia.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Connecticut if there is pending before the Committee on Military Affairs a bill providing for the granting of the distinguished flying cross to Captain Rickenbacker?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not believe there is such a bill pending before that committee.

Mr. COUZENS. I understand there is such a bill pending in the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have not heard of it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD in connection with the bill just passed a letter from the War Department and also a memorandum of the record of Captain Mendez which, to save time, I will not ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

The letter and the momorandum are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1929.

Hon. DAVID A. REED,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR REED: In compliance with your request of February 9, 1929, I am pleased to submit the following report on S. 5749:

The subject of the proposed legislation is "A bill to authorize the President to present the distinguished flying cross to Capt. Benjamin Mendez." The bill provides:

"That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to present the distinguished flying cross to Capt. Benjamin Mendez in recognition of his extraordinary achievement in linking the continents of South and North America by an aerial journey by seaplane from the northern Atlantic coast of the United States of America to Giradot, Colombia."

There are no provisions of law applicable to this bill.

The War Department approves the proposed legislation on the following grounds:

The distinguished flying cross has been awarded to citizens of foreign countries as follows (Public, No. 341, 70th Cong., approved May 2, 1928):

To Col. Francesco de Pinedo in recognition of his aerial journey of 25,000 miles by flying boat, in the course of which he arrived in the United States by air from Rome.

To Dieudonne Costes and Joseph LeBrix in recognition of their aerial journey of 35,000 miles, in the course of which they arrived in the United States by air after making the first nonstop flight across the South Atlantic.

To Ehrenfried Gunther von Huenefeld, James C. FitzMaurice, and Hermann Koehl, in recognition of their having made the first nonstop flight by airplane from Europe to North America.

The flight performed by Señor Mendez was similar in character to those for which the distinguished flying cross was awarded to the flyers enumerated above.

The award of this medal to Benjamin Mendez will be appreciated not only by the recipient but by his government and countrymen and should tend to draw closer the bonds of friendship between Colombia and the United States.

If any additional information from the War Department is desired, I shall be pleased to furnish it.

Sincerely yours,

DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
Secretary of War.

FEBRUARY 7, 1929.

Memorandum

CAPT. BENJAMIN MENDEZ

Captain Mendez studied for several years in the following military aviation schools of the United States:

Army flying schools in Texas from March 1926, to March, 1927;

Mitchel Field from April, 1927, to September, 1927;

Naval air station, Hampton Roads, from September, 1927, to January, 1928;

Army Air Corps Tactical School, Langley Field, Va., from February to June, 1928;

Mitchel Field from August to September, 1928.

He recently made a flight from New York to Bogota, passing through the States of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, and later stopping at the Panama Canal Zone. The flight was financed by public subscription started by a newspaper in Bogota and had the support and favor of the Colombian Government and the Colombian Congress, which also assisted the flight. Just before beginning the flight, Captain Mendez was received in Washington by the President of the United States, who extended his best wishes for the success of the project. Captain Mendez reached Bogota on January 7, 1929, and received a tremendous ovation.

Captain Mendez is well known to Army officers in this country, and it is understood that he is very highly thought of by his instructors and the other officers with whom he has come in contact. His flight was the first made by a Colombian aviator from this country to Colombia and in itself was a significant "good-will" performance which has been made highly beneficial to the United States by the very friendly attitude of Captain Mendez toward this country, and the manner in which he has used his undoubted influence with the Colombian authorities for the furtherance of good relations between Colombia and the United States.

It is thought that it would be both practicable and appropriate to request the Congress to confer the distinguished flying cross on Captain Mendez. The decoration would be greatly appreciated, not only by him but by the entire Colombian people, and is well merited on account of his splendid performance.

LANDS CEDED TO THE UNITED STATES BY MEXICO

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys gave consideration this morning to Senate Resolution 291, in regard to the investigation of certain land grants situated in the southwestern portion of the country. By direction of the committee, I report a resolution (S. Res. 329) continuing in effect the resolution (S. Res. 291) to investigate charges of illegal delivery to private interests of lands ceded to the United States by the Government of Mexico, during the first regular session of the next Congress and asking for an appropriation to carry the investigation forward. I ask that the resolution may be printed and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, the resolution will be printed and so referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 329) reported by Mr. BRATTON from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate as follows:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution No. 291, agreed to January 7, 1929, authorizing and directing the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, or any subcommittee thereof, to investigate the cession of lands by the Government of Mexico to the United States, as fully set forth in said resolution, hereby is continued and extended in full force and effect until the end of the first regular session of the Seventy-first Congress, and that $5,000, in addition to the amount heretofore authorized, hereby is authorized to be expended from the contingent fund of the Senate in furtherance of the purposes of said resolution.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KEYES:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 217) amending the act entitled "An act authorizing the erection for the sole use of the Pan American Union of an office building on the square of land lying between Eighteenth Street, C Street, and Virginia Avenue NW., in the city of Washington, D. C.," approved May 16, 1928; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

NATIONAL ORIGINS

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a joint resolution, which I ask may be read at length and lie on the table.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 218) to postpone the taking effect of the national-origins provisions of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the practicability of the national-origins clause of the immigration act of 1924 has long been a matter of great uncertainty; and

Whereas the operation of the national-origins clause will greatly alter the quotas of immigration; and

Whereas the Commissioner of Immigration has failed to approve the theory embodied in the national-origins clause; and

Whereas the Congress has twice postponed the effective date of the national-origins clause because of the uncertainty of the practicability and justness of the theory embodied therein; and

Whereas the commission, consisting of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, appointed to determine the quotas under the national-origins clause has made clear its lack of confidence in the plan contained therein; and

Whereas one of the members of this commission, Mr. Hoover, declared in his campaign for the Presidency for the repeal of the national-origins clause; and

Whereas the people were led to believe in the late presidential campaign by the attitude of the candidates of both major parties that there was no longer any danger of the national-origins clause becoming effective; and

Whereas the national-origins clause will become effective this year unless the Congress takes some such action as has been taken in the past looking to its postponement or repeal: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the taking effect of subdivisions (b), (c), and (d) of section 12 (the national-origins provisions) of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, is hereby postponed until the Congress shall by affirmative action declare that the provisions are practicable and advisable and can be used as a fair basis for immigration quotas.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I make the point of order that a joint resolution such as that which has just been offered should under the rules be referred to a standing committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator who introduces the joint resolution has a right to determine whether it shall lie upon the table or shall go to a committee. The author of the joint resolution has not asked that it be referred to a committee, and it seems to me that it is quite improper for my learned friend from Pennsylvania to make the point of order which he has.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution may be referred to a committee by a majority vote, but there is nothing mandatory as to its reference to a committee.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Under the rules must not the joint resolution be referred to a standing committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not necessary that it should be so referred under the rules.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WALSH of Montana submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the second deficiency appropriation bill, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page —, line —, insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion, and under regulations to be prescribed by him, to sell or otherwise dispose of the surplus elk from the Yellowstone National Park herd, and all moneys received from the sale of any such surplus elk shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the second deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place, to insert:

"For plans, specifications, and construction of a hospital at the Home for the Aged in the District of Columbia, $150,000."

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 17053, the legislative appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place, insert the following:

"For the services of Dr. G. R. King as a sanitary engineer in the office of the Architect of the Capitol, at the rate of $3,600 per annum, and for a helper and supplies, $1,400; in all, $5,000."

GOOD ROADS—ADDRESS BY COL. T. L. KIRKPATRICK (S. DOC. NO. 223)

On motion of Mr. OVERMAN, an address delivered before the joint convention of the United States Good Roads Association and the Bankhead National Highway Association by Col. T. L. Kirkpatrick, of Charlotte, N. C., at Des Moines, Iowa, May 28, 1928, and printed in the RECORD January 3, 1929, in connection with Mr. OVERMAN'S remarks, was ordered to be printed as a document.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have a valuable letter from H. L. Baker, a prominent wheat grower in La Crosse, Kans. I think it would be well worth while to bring it to the attention of Senators, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LA CROSSE, KANS., February 11, 1929.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR:

* * * * * * *

What is interesting us in the wheat-growing country is what will the farm relief be from the extra session of Congress. There is one thing that we think should be looked into and that is the protein in wheat. There is a great spread in price on the Kansas City market, ranging from $1.15 to $1.37 per bushel. They claim that the difference is on account of the protein. Wheat here that tests 60 to 62 pounds with good color and sweet only brings $1 to $1.03 to-day. They claim the protein is low.

The years we have light wheat they test it as to weight and pay accordingly, but our good heavy wheat sells according to the protein, and as there is no way of testing protein here, we have to take what they give us at the other end. One dealer told me that he had a carload of wheat that was tested for protein at Hutchinson, Wichita, and Kansas City, and the difference was as much as one. That is, at one place it tested 11 and at another place it was 12. Therefore it makes us wonder if there is as much in protein as they claim.

It seems that the large baking concerns and the large mills have almost control of the wheat situation, and with their chemists they tell us just what kind of wheat makes the best flour, but we have no one who is looking out for our side of the situation.

When they are framing a bill for farm relief, I was wondering if it would not be advisable in some way that this test could be made of different kinds of flour with different qualities of protein, under Government supervision, to find out just whether there is as much in what they claim as there is.

Some time ago the farmers' elevator sent in a sack of screenings which looked as if there was no flour in it, but the protein test was 17, while the test of 60 to 62 pound wheat was 11.30 to 12. Is there anyone who would think that the screenings would make better flour and better bread than the heavy wheat?

There is doubtless something in protein, but the big millers and bakers have it in their own hands and regulate the price of wheat to suit themselves, and they certainly would not object to having a Government supervision of the baking of the bread with different kinds of flour. In that way, we would know whether the spread in the price of wheat should be as great as it is on account of the protein.

I am around farm homes a great deal and when I see the struggle so many have to make to get along, and the sacrifices the housewives and the children have to make, I feel that something should be done so that they could get every dollar the wheat is worth.

I realize that the large corporations are a necessity, and the large bakeries and mills are important, but I think they should be regulated and controlled, and supervised by the Government the same as any other industry. Our farmers are under a big expense in raising wheat and buying from the manufacturer tractors, combines, and all kinds of farm implements, and in the manufacturing of same a great many laboring men are employed.

Therefore, the proposition I spoke of in regard to protein as to bread-making qualities of wheat should be looked after very carefully by the Government, and provisions should be made in the bill for farm relief.

I am not knocking on big corporations. I realize they are very important, and combination of capital is very important because we could not do very much without it, but I believe in a fair deal all around.

I realize that you are busy and this is a good deal longer letter than I intended to write, but I have been studying this over a great deal lately and I took this opportunity to write to you in regard to it.

We are all very much interested in the extra session of Congress and will watch it with much interest.

I remain,

Very truly yours,

H. L. BAKER.

THE DEMAND FOR PROFESSIONAL BANK MANAGEMENT

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, on the 12th instant, before the Ohio Bankers' Association, at Columbus, Ohio, Hon. J. W. Pole, Comptroller of the Currency, delivered an interesting address on The Demand for Professional Bank Management. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DEMAND FOR PROFESSIONAL BANK MANAGEMENT

The last two decades have witnessed a remarkable development in the volume and in the variety of the banking business. Demands for financial services unheard of by the last generation are now required to be met by banking institutions. The old simple form of banking in which the banker relied almost entirely upon his personal knowledge of his customers is no longer adequate to meet the present-day situation.

We need only refer to the history of banking in the State of Ohio for an illustration. In the year ending June 30, 1908, there were 990 banks of all classes in operation in this State. These had total aggregate resources of about $952,000,000. Twenty years later, for the year ending June 30, 1928, there were 1,051 banks of all classes, but with aggregate resources of $3,377,000,000. Thus while the number of banks in the State of Ohio has remained almost stationery the banking resources are nearly four times as great. This means that the officers of these banks have had nearly four times as much business thrust upon them as they had 20 years ago. Nor do these figures for resources tell the whole story, because they do not take into account the tremendous growth of the trust business now in the hands of these banks nor of the investment securities which they buy for sale over their counters. The State of Ohio may be taken as an index of the development of banking throughout the United States, for here are represented every type of banking from those banks situated in the outlying agricultural districts to those in the most congested commercial and industrial centers.

Twenty years is an extremely short time in the history of a State or a nation. The remarkable increase in growth of the banking business within that time can be taken as an indication of the trend toward a future growth in even greater volume. Another 20 years should see the banking resources of this State exceed $12,000,000,000 It takes no gift of prophecy to make this prediction. We are still a very young country and the full force of our economic vitality has yet to be developed.

Our population will greatly increase, our cities become larger and larger and our rural population denser than it is to-day. There will be further expansions and intensifications of industrial activity. Our world commerce, already at imposing figures to-day, must be regarded as almost in its infancy. The very economic necessity of the situation will bring agriculture up to a higher point of efficiency. And any statement as to the future of transportation and communication must seem extravagant beginning as we are with transportation by air at great speed over vast distances and communication through the air by radio.

All of these developments will be reflected in the expansion of banking resources for our banks are the handmaids of progress, supporting, sustaining, and serving in an essential capacity every forward economic movement.

There was a time in this country when almost any person of average intelligence could aspire to become a banker without any special previous training. It may be said that it was the original theory of the law that any group of citizens had a right to form a banking corporation. The old-fashioned banker was primarily a custodian and a lender of money. If he possessed a natural shrewdness of mind and a strong character he was likely to succeed. In the local community he was the dominant financial figure. He had opportunities to make money outside of his banking business. He became financially interested in the local street-car company, in the light and power company, in the gas works, in the ice plant, and in other such enterprises in which local capital participated. These opportunities are also fast disappearing not only because modern banking requires all of the energy and attention of the banker but also because these local forms of public utilities are fast giving way before the economy and efficiency of great central organizations operating through local branches and there is no local financing. Some banks of this old type still remain in existence, but they must be regarded now as survivals of a financial era which has passed.

Modern banking is a highly complicated and technical business, and it is exemplified primarily by the city banks which have been compelled to meet the varied financial demands of commerce and industry. It is in these commercial centers that the competition in all lines of business is so keen as to compel the utmost economy in operation and the most efficient management control. Out of the experience of these city banks there has developed in the United States a fairly definite opinion in financial circles as to what constitutes sound banking. This standard of bank management has not been theoretically arrived at by any manner of means. It has grown up through hard knocks, until finally the best method has been found to meet a given situation.

Let us pass briefly in review some of the principal features of modern banking. First, let us take the loans and discounts. The old-fashioned character loans have almost disappeared. This does not mean that character is not a valuable asset in the transaction. It simply means we are no longer in the pioneer stage of our civilization. We have reached a stable development where the instrumentalities of credit are ample. Great emphasis now is laid upon adequate credit information and analysis. Nothing is left to chance, guesswork, or favoritism. This credit information is often obtained as a result of the most skillful scientific investigation, involving the study of plants, machinery, cost accounting, estimates of future operations, financial history, personal reports on management, personnel, and the like. The bank must be in a position not only to acquire but to comprehend and digest the most technical information and data concerning its customers. In this country, where every variety of business operation is carried on by corporations, the bank must be generally familiar with corporate organization and management in the field of production, manufacture, transportation, and distribution, for the simple reason that it is to the banks that these corporations must turn for advice and assistance in financing their operations. Commercial banking therefore requires a fundamental knowledge of every process of commerce itself.

Now, let us look at the business of buying and selling investment securities by banks. This is largely a postwar development. It is well known that the Liberty loan campaigns during the war served to educate the public at large in making small investments in sound securities. The tremendous commercial expansion in this country following the war has been financed in increasing volume through the issuance of investment securities in which the general public is invited to invest. It is natural that the banks should participate in this development because their customers turn to them for advice.

The amendment in the McFadden Bank Act of 1927 has added impetus to the movement to make the banks distributors of the best type of investment securities. This means that the modern bank must be equipped with the proper instrumentalities to deal with this new financial development. It imposes a grave responsibility upon the banks which in turn requires them to create the facilities for a comprehensive and accurate knowledge of the various issues of securities which from time to time come upon the market. Not only must they have adequate financial and statistical information with respect to each issue but they must be in a position to interpret this information and to apply it to the particular transaction in hand.

Turning now to the fiduciary operations of the modern bank we find a similar growth and development. Within our own time we have seen the banks gradually displace the old type of individual and personal trustee, executor, administrator, guardian, and custodian. It has become a function of banking to administer the estates of deceased persons, many of which are of great magnitude. In addition, largely as a postwar development, there has been a most remarkable growth in the creation of corporate trusts. For every issue of securities for corporate financing, whether in the form of stocks, bonds, debentures, or notes, a bank is required to perform some ministerial or fiduciary function. The bank has thus become an essential factor in the procedure of corporate finance and must act as trustee of bond and debenture issues and of long-term notes, as fiscal agent, as registrar, as transfer agent, as a participant in underwriting syndicates, as depositary under plans of reorganization, as assignee and receiver, as custodian or trustee for investment trusts—in fact, in every fiduciary capacity which may be required by the machinery of corporation finance.

The future of the trust business of banks in the United States would seem to make it one of the most important phases of banking business. On the other hand, its proper administration makes it absolutely necessary that the bank equip itself with the most advanced facilities for discharging these fiduciary responsibilities and obligations.

The impressive growth of trust service in the banking field is illustrated by considering the expansion in recent years of the fiduciary activities of banks in the national banking system. The passage of the Federal reserve act made possible the further extension of corporate trust facilities to practically every section of the Nation. Since February 25, 1915, when the first permit under this law was issued to a national bank, hundreds of banks throughout the United States have availed themselves of this opportunity to render additional service to their communities, until to-day 2,400 national banks have trust powers, representing 31 per cent of the number and 73 per cent of the capital of all banks in the national banking system. During 1928 these banks were administering 63,776 trusts, with individual trust assets aggregating more than $3,000,000,000, and were acting as trustees for bond and note issues totaling close to $8,000,000,000.

Compared with the year 1926 these figures represent an increase of 47 per cent in the number of national banks administering trusts; an increase of 145 per cent in the number of trusts being administered; an increase of 257 per cent in the volume of assets of individual trusts, while the bond and note issues outstanding for which these banks are acting as trustees aggregate in amount four times that in 1926.

About one out of every three national banks has authority to administer trusts, while in the State of Ohio 21 per cent of the number of national banks, representing 65 per cent of all of the capital of the national banks in the State, are authorized to act in fiduciary capacities. Since 1926 the number of trusts being administered by these banks in Ohio has increased 52 per cent, while the volume of note and bond issues for which they have been named to act as trustees has doubled.

There is another phase of banking which has made remarkable strides within the last few years, and that is the savings department. The great increase in individual wealth affecting every class of our population has put before the banks of the country a potential opportunity to build up a large savings business. Here again the bank must know how to cultivate habits of thrift in its community and to carry on extensively an intelligent campaign for savings deposits. That this is being done is evidenced by the remarkable increase in the aggregate total in the savings deposits in the country year by year. Taking the national banks alone, here in the State of Ohio these deposits have grown from $20,700,000 in 1908 to $269,000,000 in 1928, being an increase of over tenfold. There was an even greater increase in the State banks, although I have not the exact figures. For the country at large the ratio of increase is about the same as for the State of Ohio.

This brings me back to the subject of this address and that is that banking in the future will be in the hands of professional management—I am using this term as opposed to amateur management. This applies to banks of all classes, whether city of small town, because banking in its essence is the same whether the population served be large or small. The very nature of our economic life, which expresses itself through corporate organizations and in mass production, will naturally demand of the smaller banks the same standards and type of banking services which have been demonstrated as sound and efficient by the larger city banks.

While the need for a higher training is increasingly demanded for making commercial loans upon the proper credit basis, it is in the newer fields of banking—the trust business and the securities business—where technical training and specialized experience are emphatically the essential requirements for success. It is in these two fields that there is likely to be the greatest future expansion in banking, and those banks will maintain the largest growth which equip themselves technically to meet this opportunity. It would be worse than useless for a bank to embark upon them with an amateur management.

In general it must be said that old-fashioned business practices in banking must give way to scientific methods in the acquisition and the formulation of information, and in the application of the banking policies based thereon, by men who have acquired what might be called a professional knowledge of banking—a technical equipment to deal with method and policy.

I have in this address attempted to point out a practical condition which is facing the banking business to which remedial measures must be applied. I have also suggested the type of management personnel that will be necessary whatever form the remedy may take, but I have not attempted to go further than that.

I may, however, say in closing that the large number of bank failures outside of the metropolitan centers during the past few years is an indication there are more banks than bankers. The scarcity of trained executives—that is to say, executives with that degree of managerial ability required by modern conditions—may be one of the underlying reasons for the rapid spread of branch banking and group or chain banking ideas among bankers and business men in this country. As the business of banking is growing at a more rapid pace than executives are being developed to operate each unit bank as a separate institution, it would seem to be an almost natural and logical outcome that this scarcity of talent will lead to a more centralized form of banking control.

INVESTIGATING FEDERAL RESERVE

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette of Wednesday morning, February 13, 1929, entitled "Investigating Federal Reserve."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The editorial is as follows:

INVESTIGATING FEDERAL RESERVE

It seems that those who manage the financial affairs always do the right thing at the wrong time or in a clumsy way. It required no survey, reports, nor figures to expose the fact that the loanable bank funds of the country were being concentrated in a few centers, principally in New York. Banks, private individuals, and corporations, with surplus money, sent it to New York to get the call-loan rate. That is merely the operation of the law of supply and demand.

If surplus money can command, on safe security, 10 or 12 per cent in New York, there is no law or regulation that can prevent the owner from making the loan nor compel him to keep it at home for the tax gatherer. Raising the call rate in New York did not stop speculation. No one can use large sums at 12 per cent except a gambler in stocks.

Hence, the stock market got most of the money that was in New York and New York got most of the loanable money of the country because it was sent there to get the high rate.

Congress now thinks that it has a "bite" on something good—going after the Federal Reserve Board. Wrong time, of course. It should have done this several years ago. Federal reserve rates ought never be above 3 per cent—4 at the highest. The law ought to prohibit the Federal reserve banks from charging more. That would be a "Government of law, not of men." The eligibility of bank paper ought to be changed.

The attitude of the system ought to be changed by at least some warning gestures. If this Government institution can charge 7 per cent it can demand 20 per cent.

It was never intended to be a money-making institution, but a source, a reservoir of sound money. It is fool proof against unsound money.

But what can be expected of a Congress that proceeds now upon the assumption that money is too cheap—so plentiful that it is debased? If the old saying that money is worth its interest be true, then does 12 per cent call money show that it is cheap and plentiful or high and scarce? What do the small business men say? Why are intangible properties like stocks high, while land and tangible properties are low?

One is the thing itself; the other is the paper issued on the thing.

Over 60 years ago Grant broke the Black Friday gold squeeze by offering the Government's gold on the market. In 1914, McAdoo prevented a money panic by depositing Government funds where needed and giving assurance to the public that the Federal reserve system would use its resources to prevent any panic due to the war in Europe. The effect was magical.

Wall Street has the right to speculate. Most business is speculation. The growth and expansion of the country in the future is an element of investment. Buying is based largely on future increase in value. The railroads, banks, and manufacturing plants have grown in the last 20 years many times beyond the wildest guesses of optimists. But who said "man can not live on bread alone"? The country can not live on consolidations and dealing in stocks alone.

The small producers, merchants, traders, and farmers are going broke. Out in the country and small towns there is not enough money to do business and start new enterprises.

The big concerns can get money on stocks and bonds; but the real producers, who develop and build, and upon whose shoulders rest these stocks and bonds, have no market for their property and must pay too high interest for money to develop.

It is not fair to pull the horse that is ahead; but it is legitimate to whip up the horse that is behind.

Prohibiting and restraining Wall Street and nagging the big organizations is a backward movement. The farmers and producers want the big organizations to be prosperous and their stocks to go up.

But what will the 90 per cent not in those organizations do when we reach the point that only big capital can do business? All these big things are composed of units that once were small beginnings.

But is the day of small beginnings over? If so, will most of the people have to work for wages? It all gets back to the lifeblood—money and credits. That is at the bottom of all squeezes and deflations and inflations that distress the many for the few. The Federal reserve system can compel an even flow of money and credits according to the supply and demand. But such a consummation is impossible with the Federal interest rate bobbing up and down at the behest of a very few. Banks can not finance their customers when the Government reservoir charges one rate to-day and another to-morrow. Small traders must get their money from local banks; the latter are shielded from a money scare by the Federal reserve bank. What a shield it is that is steel one day and cardboard the next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Farrell, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 3936) to regulate the practice of the healing art to protect the public health in the District of Columbia, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. ZIHLMAN, Mr. BOWMAN, and Mr. BLANTON were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

AMENDMENT TO RULE XXXVIII—OPEN EXECUTIVE SESSIONS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] I ask unanimous consent that Senate Resolution 322, to amend Rule XXXVIII by providing for the consideration of nominations in open executive sessions, except in certain cases, submitted by him, and now on the table, may go over without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INVESTIGATION OF SALT CREEK OIL LEASES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 320) submitted by Mr. WALSH of Montana February 7, 1929, was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approves and adopts the minority report herewith, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, of the investigation into the renewal of the contract executed in the year 1922 by Albert B. Fall, Secretary of the Interior, and the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., for the sale of the royalty oil accruing to the United States from the leases of lands within the Salt Creek district in the State of Wyoming, and into the cancellation of such renewal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the resolution before the Senate asks that the Senate approve and adopt the report submitted by seven members of the Committee on Public Lands investigating the question of the execution, renewal, and cancellation of what is known as the Salt Creek royalty oil contract. The report advises the Senate of the circumstances attending one of the official acts of the late Secretary of the Interior, Dr. Hubert Work, which resulted in a loss to the Government of the United States of $300,000; likewise of the delay in the action of the Department of Justice with respect to the cancellation of the contract, resulting in a loss of a thousand dollars a day for each day that the delay continued, which was something like five months.

The contract in question was executed in the month of December, 1922, by the then Secretary of the Interior, Albert B. Fall, to the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. It operated as a sale of the royalty oil accruing to the Government from the leases in the Salt Creek field for a period of five years, with a provision in the contract to the effect that the purchaser should have the right, upon six months' notice, to a renewal of the contract for a like period of five years.

The contract was executed practically contemporaneously with the leases of the naval oil reserves; that is to say, it was intervening practically the execution of the lease of the Teapot Dome and the execution of the lease which eventually gave to the Pan-American Co. the control of naval reserve No. 1 in the State of California.

The contract was made pursuant to the provisions of section 30 of the leasing law of 1920. Under that law the royalty coming to the Government from the lease of oil lands might be paid either in kind or in cash. If it were paid in kind the Government would either be obliged to store its royalty oil or would be obliged to sell it. No provision having been made for the indefinite storage of the oil, the law provided that the Secretary of the Interior might dispose of the oil. The law also provided that he should dispose of it either by public auction or under sealed bids. The act, in that regard, reads as follows:

> Upon granting any oil or gas lease under this act, and from time to time thereafter during said lease, the Secretary of the Interior shall, except whenever in his judgment it is desirable to retain the same for the use of the United States, offer for sale for such period as he may determine, upon notice and advertisement on sealed bids or at public auction, all royalty oil and gas accruing or reserved to the United States under such lease. Such advertisement and sale shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to reject all bids whenever within his judgment the interest of the United States demands; and in cases where no satisfactory bid is received or where the accepted bidder fails to complete the purchase, or where the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that it is unwise in the public interest to accept the offer of the highest bidder, the Secretary of the Interior, within his discretion, may readvertise such royalty for sale, or sell at private sale at not less than the market price for such period, or accept the value thereof from the lessee.

Proposals were advertised and bids were received, bids being requested for a period of either 5 or 10 years. Various companies engaged in the oil business submitted bids. Among the bids was one submitted by the Mammoth Oil Co., to which the lease of the Teapot Dome had some few months before been granted. Its bid was received the day after, under the advertisement, the bids were to be closed. The advertisement required that the bids be submitted on or before the 15th day of November. The Mammoth Oil Co.'s bid did not come in until the following day, November 16.

A little history that is somewhat old in this connection will be interesting. In the month of November, 1922, Harry F. Sinclair visited Mr. Fall at his ranch at Three Rivers, N. Mex. The question of the disposal of these royalty oils was there discussed, and on his way east Mr. Sinclair stopped off at Pratt, Kans., and sent in a bid on the 15th day of November, which was not received at the department until the following day, November 16, offering to buy the oil to the extent of 10,000 barrels production per day at a price therein fixed. The bid of the Mammoth Oil Co. was held by the Secretary to be the highest bid received, which undoubtedly it was. He recognized it, however, as having come within the period limited and made no question of it having been received too late.

The Mammoth Oil Co. requested that instead of the contract being written to it it should be written to the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., to which request the Secretary of the Interior assented. The Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. said it would take the place and perform all of the obligations of the Mammoth Oil Co. It likewise agreed to take off the limitation of 10,000 barrels a day. So the contract was written to the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., but it contained a provision not suggested in the advertisement at all, namely, that the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. should have the right to a renewal of the contract at the expiration of the period of five years. Thus an advantage accrued to the Mammoth Oil Co. and the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. that was not enjoyed by any of the other bidders for the contract. The contract went into force, and the Government secured by virtue of it through the sale of royalty oil accruing to it during the period of the five years something over $35,000,000.

In the month of June, 1927, the contract having been made effective as of the 1st day of January, 1923, the purchaser, the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., served notice upon the Secretary that it desired to renew the contract. The contract was renewed in the month of February, 1928, by Doctor Work, the then Secretary of the Interior, the renewal to be effective as of the 1st day of January of last year.

Some protests had been filed, however, prior to that time against the renewal of the contract, to which reference will be made later. But after the contract had been renewed the White Eagle Refining Co., operating a smelter at Casper, Wyo., and one of the original bidders for the contract in 1922, learning for the first time in the spring of 1928 that that contract had been renewed, and having theretofore no knowledge whatever of the fact that there was a provision for the renewal of the contract in it, served a protest upon the Secretary, insisting, among other things, that the law gave no right to the Secretary of the Interior to make a contract in which an option was granted for a renewal of the contract. This protest and the contention made were supported by reference to a number of authorities more or less conclusive in character.

The Secretary, through his assistant, Mr. Finney, referred this protest to the solicitor of the department; and thereafter an opinion was rendered by the solicitor against the contention thus made. Thereupon, on the 27th day of April, 1928, the whole matter was referred to the Department of Justice for an opinion in the matter, in order to guide the Interior Department in its action.

Five months and 19 days thereafter, on the 17th day of October, 1928, an opinion was rendered by the Department of Justice sustaining the contention made by the White Eagle Refining Co. that there was no authority in the law for the incorporation in the contract of the renewal provision; that it was, therefore, void, and the renewal of the contract was invalid and nugatory. Thereupon the Secretary of the Interior canceled the contract, refused to deliver to the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. any more oil under the contract, and again advertised the oil for sale for a period of three years. As a result of this new advertising a bid was received for the oil, the bidder agreeing to pay 21¾ cents a barrel more than the amount stipulated in the original and in the renewed contract. As the Government was then securing and for some period theretofore had been securing about 5,000 barrels of oil per day, the advantage to the Government by reason of the transaction amounts to something about $1,100 a day. It would be $1,100 if the deliveries were 5,000 barrels a day and the increase were 22 cents instead of 21¾; but for the convenience of computation it may be regarded that the Government got an advance of 20 cents a barrel, and 5,000 barrels would make just an even $1,000 a day that we are getting for the oil more than we were getting. In other words, every day that the renewed contract continued in operation the Government of the United States lost $1,000; and, it having been in operation something over 10 months, the total loss to the Government was approximately $300,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is assuming that the opinion of the Attorney General is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator understands, of course, that there has been no judicial decision on this question at all; that the Attorney General has this matter now before the courts to get a judicial determination.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And that is assuming, too, that the suit for recovery and for damages which the department has filed against the Sinclair interests will not be successful. In the event it is successful, of course that can be claimed as damages.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then it will not be a loss to the Government. In other words, the Government certainly has lost nothing to date. Is not that true?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; that is not correct; because if the advertisement had taken place the Government would be just so much ahead now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; but if it is finally recovered——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It may possibly recover.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes. If it recovers, then the Senator can not say that the Government up to date has lost this money.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Government has lost it up to date, yes; but let us have the facts about the matter.

As I shall detail a little later, early in the spring complaints were made that the original contract made by Fall was tainted with fraud, and an effort was made to gather the facts to establish that contention. The Government now has instituted a suit to recover, not on the basis that the contract was illegal, as recited in its opinion, but it has brought a suit to recover upon the ground of fraud in the original contract. It may or may not recover in that action. If it does, this amount probably will be recovered by the Government. It all depends upon whether the Government can establish fraud in the original transaction. It may establish it. Up to the present time I have not been advised of any evidence that would lead me to believe that that difficult question of fact can be established, although I am not fully advised about it. Up to the present time the Government has lost this $300,000. It may possibly recover it. That is all that can be said about it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I think it can properly be said that it may probably recover.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can not say that. Perhaps the Senator from Indiana can.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming, to begin with, that the suit to recover establishes fraud in the original contract and nullifies the contract, the next question involved, then, would be the amount of the recovery. It would not follow as a matter of law that that recovery would be on the basis of the subsequent bids. It might be more or it might be less.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would not be less; but this is the situation with respect to this particular matter: Of course, the renewal being illegal under the opinion of the Supreme Court, it furnishes no basis at all for recovery, and the Government could recover from the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. from the 1st of last January on a quantum meruit——

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The measure of damages being the market value of the oil.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the market value of the oil is just what was being paid under the renewed contract; so, although the Government has a cause of action, it can recover no damages, because the measure of damages is just exactly what it was getting under the contract.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is speaking now of the renewal contract?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. I had particular reference to the action going away back to the original contract. Of course, the measure of damages would depend upon the market value of the oil during the time that contract was in effect.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the department contends—and I am not sure that is not correct—that the measure of damages in that case would be whatever profit the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. made out of the oil, not the market value, upon the rule that where there is an actual tort, with knowledge of a wrong, the measure of damages is somewhat different. However, that is a thing for the future. My assertion that the Government has lost this amount stands. It may get it back. It may get back more than that out of the lawsuit. That is for the future.

Now, Mr. President, it concerns us to inquire how it was that Doctor Work came to renew this contract. It contained a provision for its renewal. As I have heretofore indicated, prior to the time the renewal was made a man by the name of Phelan—a very able young man, and I think a public-spirited young man, formerly oil expert for the Shipping Board—went to the department and protested against the renewal, contending that there was fraud in the original contract. He was quite insistent about that; but he did not present to the department any facts going to sustain his belief that the original contract was tainted with fraud. Anyway, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Judge Finney, referred his protest to the Solicitor for the Department of the Interior, with a request that that officer advise him as to whether, under the applicable provisions of the law, the renewal was justified. To use his own language, he wanted to know from the solicitor whether a renewal of the contract was "warranted under the provisions of the applicable law."

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. BRATTON. Will the Senator tell me from what page he is reading? I have tried to put my finger on that particular communication, and have not been able to do so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read from page 3 of the report that I am canvassing, about three-fifths of the distance down.

The solicitor did not write any opinion; but a memorandum opinion was written by a member of the board of review of the Bureau of Public Lands. It was, however, O. K'd by the solicitor, Mr. Patterson. It came back the next day—bear in mind, the next day!—after the request for the opinion went to him, the 28th day of April. That opinion, if it may be called such, disposed of the important question of law which was submitted to the solicitor in just seven words. It recites at considerable length the facts in relation to the matter, and with respect to the question of law advanced it says:

> It will be observed that there is no statutory provision as to the term of a sales contract involving royalty oil. That is a detail clearly within the discretion of the Secretary—

That is correct. That is the plain law. Now he goes on—> as is also a provision for renewal.

That is all there is in the opinion upon the difficult and intricate question of law which is submitted to the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior; and that is not correct, because there is not any such provision at all in the law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is the conclusion, is it not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the argument. That is all there is on the subject.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is that the entire opinion—the seven words?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I said the opinion is a long recital of the facts, and that is all there is of the discussion of the facts.

But, more, Mr. President, the opinion proceeds upon the assumption that this sale was not a public sale at all, not made upon bidding, but that it was a private sale negotiated by the Secretary of the Interior. It is important for us to inquire under what circumstances the Secretary of the Interior may make a private sale.

The opinion of the solicitor says:

> It thus appears that the Secretary has the authority and it is his duty to dispose of royalty oil by sealed bids, public auction, or private sale; that it is wholly discretionary with him as to which of these methods of disposal shall be employed.

That is not the law at all. The Secretary has no discretion to make a sale at private sale or public sale as he sees fit. He can make a private sale only "where no satisfactory bid is received," which was not the case here, because the Mammoth Oil Co.'s bid was entirely satisfactory to the Secretary. "Or where the accepted bidder fails to complete the purchase." The Mammoth Oil Co. did not fail to complete the purchase at all. It asked that the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. might be substituted, and that was entirely satisfactory to the Secretary. "Or where the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that it is unwise in the public interest to accept the offer of the highest bidder." Under those circumstances the Secretary may make a private sale, and under no other circumstances. If for any reason he rejects all the bids, he must readvertise the property.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator says that is not the law. Does the Senator mean to say or insinuate that the solicitor deliberately concealed the law?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator mean, then, in criticizing the solicitor, to say that he was ignorant of the law and therefore was not qualified for the position he held? What is the Senator's position with reference to that very question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator's position is that Doctor Work, if he had taken the opinion and read it, and had any kind of brains, would have known that it was not a good opinion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Doctor Work, then, is the man the Senator is censuring in connection with this suggestion of the solicitor?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what I have tried to make plain.

So that the solicitor, in the seven words in which he disposed of this important question, proceeded, in the first place, upon a wholly erroneous idea about the law, namely, that the Secretary of the Interior had the power to sell at a private sale if he saw fit to do so.

Mr. President, was it a private sale? As I have indicated, proposals were advertised, bids were requested, the bids were received, it was announced that the Mammoth Oil Co. was the highest bidder, letters were written by the Secretary of the Interior to the effect that the Mammoth Co. was the highest bidder; the Mammoth Co., as the highest bidder, said, "We would like to have the contract written to the Sinclair Co. instead of us, the highest bidder"; and the Sinclair Co. said, "We are willing to take the bid of the highest bidder and obligate ourselves to carry it out."

There is no record anywhere that Secretary Fall rejected all the bids for the reasons indicated in the statute or any other reason. Nobody contends that there is. But it was argued that because the contract that was actually entered into varied from the advertised proposals, therefore there must have been a private sale, and that is the basis upon which rests the contention that the sale was a private one and not a public one.

I said that the White Eagle Refining Co., learning from the newspapers that the contract had been renewed, filed its protest against the renewal. It will bear mention that no publicity whatever was given by the Department of the Interior to the fact that the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. was asking for a renewal; no publicity was given to the fact that the Department of the Interior was entertaining the idea of a renewal; no publicity was given to the fact that Mr. Phelan and others had protested against the renewal, and the White Eagle Refining Co. knew nothing about the option in the contract for a renewal, or that the department had the matter under consideration or that it had renewed it, until it was read about in the newspapers after the renewal had been effected.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the Senator himself knew, however, that they were undertaking to have it renewed, did he not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator knew that another contract of the same kind was sought to be renewed, the Cat Creek contract?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall get to that directly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I just ask the Senator——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I might as well speak about that now. Doctor Work has studiously endeavored to shift the responsibility about this matter from himself to me. What is the fact about the matter?

The facts surrounding the contract in respects of the Cat Creek field, in the State of Montana, are similar to those surrounding the Salt Creek contract. Leases were made of the Cat Creek district in Montana, a limited area, with a relatively small production, a matter of no consequence whatever. The contract for the sale of the royalty oil in that field had been granted under practically the same circumstances, bids had been requested, and the contract contained a provision for renewal, and it was likewise renewed.

A considerable correspondence came to my office from people interested in the Cat Creek contract. One of the letters asked if they could have a copy of the contract. The letter came to my office; it was routine in my office. My secretary got the letter. He wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Interior asking for a copy of the contract. He signed my name to the letter. The copy came, and he transmitted it to the person who asked for it.

In exactly the same way a letter came to my office asking if it it was understood that there would be a renewal of the Cat Creek contract.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does not the Senator——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a moment. In exactly the same way the letter was transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior; an answer came, and that answer was transmitted to the party who inquired about it. That is all I knew about it. The evidence is complete on that subject.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator means to say that he never knew that any of this Cat Creek correspondence was in his office during that period?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I knew perfectly well that it was there.

Mr. ROBINSON on Indiana. The Senator knew it contained a renewal clause, the same as this other one?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I knew from the letter which came to the office that some one was inquiring whether the department construed the contract as entitling the purchaser to a renewal.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Did not the Senator ask the department for a ruling on the question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not. That was not what I was asked. I was asked if the department construed it that way, and I asked the department and sent the letter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And that was in 1927?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was in 1927; yes.

I spoke about the want of publicity in this matter. The White Eagle Refining Co. having sent in its protest, it was referred to the Solicitor of the Interior Department, and the Solicitor of the Interior Department wrote an opinion for the information of the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Finney, who requested it. That opinion expressed the view that the contention made by the attorney for the White Eagle Refining Co., Mr. Kem, of Kansas City, was not well taken.

I do not care to review at any length that particular opinion. I merely say that it concerns itself with setting out a lot of facts to establish that the contract that was originally entered into by Fall in 1922 was a very good contract, that it was made to the highest bidder, and other things of that kind. Anyway, the contention was dismissed.

Reference was made in that connection to a decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Montana, which the Solicitor of the Interior Department thought was entirely conclusive upon the question at issue, and it does not even take a legal mind to realize from the statement of the facts that the Montana opinion does not touch side, end, or bottom of the thing. Thus it was cast off.

Then the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Finney, who seems to have handled the whole business, transferred the whole matter, on the 27th day of April, 1928, to the Department of Justice for an opinion.

Meanwhile a man by the name of Williams, in the city of New York, had written me protesting against the renewal of the contract, and alleging fraud in the original contract, and likewise that the Midwest Oil Co., a subsidiary of the Standard, had secured a monopoly of the Salt Creek field. I wrote him a letter in which I said that if he thought so, he ought to take the matter up with the President. He apparently did so, and the President referred the matter to the Department of Justice, as was entirely proper, and requested Mr. Donovan, to whom it went in the Department of Justice, to confer with me about the matter. He apparently referred the matter to two young men in his office, Kenyon and Chandler, and they came to see me. I had no information about the matter, and was unable to give them any. They had already made an examination of some of the records of the Interior Department, searching for evidence of fraud in the original transaction. The idea advanced by Mr. Kem that the option provision of the contract was void upon the ground that the Secretary had no power to grant an option, apparently never had occurred to these young men studying the matter at all. They did not discuss it with me, and it had not been suggested to me, and I did not discuss it with them. They were concerned with the question of fraud.

When this protest of Mr. Kem was referred to the Department of Justice and turned over of them, they looked it over and told Mr. Finney that they agreed with him that the Secretary had the authority. They did not even take the trouble to read the cases cited by Mr. Kem in the protest. They made no legal opinion upon the matter, but they conveyed orally to Mr. Finney that they agreed with him in the view he took.

Meanwhile Mr. Kem was getting nowhere, there was no opinion from the Department of Justice, and the Department of the Interior refused to act until the Department of Justice advised them with respect to the matter.

Mr. President, I ought to go back, before I go to that, to refer again to the original opinion furnished by Newman and Patterson. That opinion, consisting, as I have heretofore said, of seven words, so far as the question of law is concerned, is the only thing upon which Secretary Work relied in renewing this contract.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. One moment. He told us, however, upon the witness stand, that he had acted upon the advice of four officials of his force who were appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and nine other technical and legal members of his force, the entire force furnished him by the Congress of the United States.

I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator has supplied the omission I was going to suggest.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us see who these 13 persons were upon whom the Secretary relied in his action in renewing this contract.

There were Patterson and Newman, to whom I have referred. Likewise there was George Otis Smith. George Otis Smith, as Senators doubtless all know, is the Director of the Geological Survey. He is not a lawyer; he has no legal duties of any character to perform. George Otis Smith, however, ventured to express an opinion upon this subject, and this is what he said:

> In my opinion, the renewal provision in the contract with the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. is binding on the Government.

That is the extent of his discussion of this important question of law.

The other official, appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, is Mr. Havell, the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office. He wrote a letter to the Secretary about this matter, in which he said just this:

> It is respectfully recommended that the contract of December 20, 1922, be extended for an additional five years from January 1, 1928, upon the terms and conditions set out in said contract executed between the United States and the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co.

That is the extent of the opinion of Mr. Havell. Just what help that would be to the Secretary of the Interior in determining whether under the law he had a right to renew this contract I do not care to comment upon.

In addition to that the memorandum opinion made by Newman and approved by Patterson, which came back to Mr. Finney the day after his request was made, had indorsed on it the names of nine men, employees in the Geological Survey and in the Bureau of Public Lands, signifying that those nine men had read that contract and approved it. Just what help in determining the legality of the option provision the view of subordinates in the Geological Survey would be, I likewise wonder. But that is the kind of advice Secretary Work relied upon in making the renewal contract.

But he pleads strength about another matter. He pleads strength by reason of the fact that this matter went through the hands of the senior Senator from Montana, myself, and how it went through the hands of the senior Senator from Montana has already been indicated in response to the questions addressed to me by the Senator from Indiana. All of this correspondence is listed in the statement made to us by the Secretary in an attempt to exculpate himself in this matter. He lists the following:

> February 17, 1928, Senator T. J. WALSH to W. G. Williams, advising he could not understand how Government can escape the obligation to renew contract, and agrees with Secretary that he is legally bound to renew.

Secretary Work gave similar interviews to the newspapers, in which this matter was canvassed. I had a letter from Mr. Williams, as I have heretofore indicated, a rather lengthy letter, I would not say rambling, but suggesting fraud in the original contract and monopolization of the Salt Creek field by the Mid-West Co., a subsidiary of the Standard. I wrote him and a part of the correspondence is as follows:

> I am not able to ascertain from your letter or the accompanying document just how you come to be interested in the lease of the Government royalty oil accruing to it from operations in the Salt Creek field. Will you kindly advise me?
> I am unable to understand how the Government can escape the obligation to renew the contract with the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., except it treats it as void or voidable. It seems to me that neither the iniquities revealed as to the Teapot Dome lease or those that are unrevealed concerning the acquisition of the lands in the Salt Creek field by the Standard or its subsidiaries in violation of the leasing act can in any wise affect the validity of the contract by which the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. bought the Government's royalty oil. I regret to say that I am obliged to agree with the Secretary that he is legally bound to renew, although I have not been able to give the subject the study that it ought to have in order to arrive at a conclusion such as would be reached by a good lawyer after a careful study. I assume the Secretary has taken the advice of his counsel.

That is heralded as an indorsement of the position of the Secretary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator was thoroughly familiar with the contract, was he not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Did not the Senator have in his office a copy of the contract with the Lewistown Oil & Refining Co., an exactly similar contract?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have a copy of the testimony taken in the Teapot Dome hearings, the naval oil leases, and I discover from a report made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] that in that compilation there is a copy of the contract. Let me explain.

After we had got along in that hearing to a point where it was quite obvious that the transaction was a rotten one, the chairman of the committee, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], addressed a communication to Mr. Bain, who was then at the head of the Bureau of Mines, asking him a series of questions. Of course, it was done simply for the purpose of giving Mr. Bain an opportunity to file a brief for Secretary Fall. He filed that brief in the nature of a long letter in which he referred to this royalty oil contract and set forth a copy of it. That was sent to Senator SMOOT and introduced into the record without ever reading it. I have the record here before me.

Mr. GLENN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a moment. Here is the record:

Senator SMOOT. I received an answer to that letter dated November 30, 1923. Each question asked by me is answered in detail, and with the answers there is reference made to certain memoranda and documents supporting the answers. I think, if there is no objection whatever, it would be well to have them made a part of the record so that we may have the whole subject before the committee, and then whoever desires to read it in the record, just as he has answered the questions supported by documents, could do so. Without objection, it will be incorporated in the record.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a moment. Doctor Bain appeared before the committee at our request and demand, and he was interrogated about everything with reference to which the committee cared to examine him. I yield now to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I had reference in my question addressed to the Senator a moment ago to an identical contract entered into at practically the same time with the Lewistown Oil & Refining Co.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the Cat Creek company, to which I have referred.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In January, 1923, six years ago, the Senator did request a copy of that contract.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I dare say that is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And the Senator did have that contract.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the manner indicated, my secretary came along and identified my signature to a letter requesting it as being in his handwriting.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator at that time was thoroughly familiar with the contract, was he not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was not. I had no knowledge of the contract. Let me explain.

Both the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] and myself were deeply interested in the letting of the contract for the sale of the Salt Creek oil. At that time Governor Haskell, of the State of Oklahoma, was constructing a railroad running from Casper through Sheridan, the home of Senator KENDRICK, to Miles City, in the State of Montana, to connect up the Union Pacific line with the Northern Pacific and Milwaukee lines there. We were very desirous that he should get the business. He was a bidder for this oil, expecting to get it as freight for his new railroad, and we were very desirous that he should get the contract, in order that the railroad enterprise should go forward. Therefore we were in a way in touch with the transaction.

Secretary Fall wrote a letter telling about the bids and informed us that the Mammoth Oil Co. was the highest bidder, and its bid was so much higher than Governor Haskell's bid that, of course, we had no reason to protest, but neither Senator KENDRICK nor I had any kind of notion that there was a renewal provision in the contract, and neither of us ever saw the contract—at least I speak for myself when I say that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am speaking of the Lewistown contract, and the Senator knew all about that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have told all I know about the Lewistown contract.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Was not the Senator interested in having the Lewistown contract entered into?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Did not the Senator, as a matter of fact, take that up at the time with the department in that very connection?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be pleased to have the Senator read any of my letters to the department.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that after the contract was let Secretary Fall, on February 17, 1923, wrote to the Senator from Montana calling attention to letting of the contract for the sale of Cat Creek oil to the Lewistown Oil & Refining Co., and of his interest in the contract—meaning the interest of the Senator from Montana—and that he had been "courteous enough to counsel me in the disposition of that oil in an effort to secure the greatest revenue from it." Is not that letter in the possession of the Senator from Montana at the present time?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then the Senator knew all about the Cat Creek contract?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I knew that bids had been requested for the Cat Creek oil. I knew that the highest bid had been accepted and that a contract had been entered into.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But did not the Senator know what the contents of the contract were?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; not that I have any recollection of.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Did not the Senator on January 23, 1923, write for a copy of that identical contract?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have already told the Senator about that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Did not the Senator then receive it and is it not now in the Senator's office and has it not been there all these years, six years?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The record will disclose to the Senator that as soon as it was received it was sent to the parties who requested it. The record before the Senator will disclose that fact.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. When the Senator was taking that interest in the Cat Creek lease, he never read the contract?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not,

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And did not know anything at all about the contract?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. The record shows that the man requested the Senator from Montana to furnish him information about the contract. The Senator's secretary, as a matter of routine, requested the department to furnish the copy. The copy came through the mail in response to the letter written and signed by the Senator's secretary. The Senator's secretary, further, as a matter of routine, transmitted it to the inquiring constituent. The record is conclusive that the Senator did not even read it.

Let me inquire of the Senator from Indiana if he thinks that such a situation can well serve either to fasten responsibility on the Senator from Montana or to exculpate the Interior Department for whatever responsibility rests upon it? I am not now expressing an opinion about that degree of responsibility, but whatever it is, do the facts which I have reviewed briefly either tend to place responsibility upon the Senator from Montana or to exculpate the Department of the Interior?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not trying to fasten any responsibility on anybody. I am saying, or rather intimating, that if this was routine in the Senator's office that is one thing, but it is generally known and everybody knows that the Senator from Montana himself made the principal fight for the leasing act of 1920 and these were constituents of the Senator's in Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall object to an argument about that just now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. So that I do not see that anyone needs exculpating. It strikes me that the Secretary of the Interior did everything he was called upon to do, and it seems to me perhaps the Senator from Montana did. I am just wondering why there should be any criticism.

Mr. BRATTON. Does the Senator see any similarity in a matter passing through the office of a Senator purely as a routine item, with which the Senator was charged with no degree of official responsibility, and the responsibility of a department enjoined with the duty of acting in the premises?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not care to take further time from the Senator from Montana, but that question is easily answered by me. I think all of us are responsible to a degree even for routine matters in our offices in any opinions we give in matters of this kind which are grave. I can not agree with the Senator in the intimation he has made that there has been any dereliction of duty whatever in the Department of the Interior or the Department of Justice. But I do not care to argue that at this time. I apologize to the Senator from Montana for taking so much of his time.

Mr. BRATTON. I was curious to know, if the Senator from Montana will indulge me to make one further inquiry, why it is that the Senator from Indiana lays so much stress upon the fact that a copy of the Cat Creek contract passed through the office of the Senator from Montana as a matter of routine, handled by his secretary, and with which the Senator himself was entirely unfamiliar. What relation or what importance does that have in the solution of the pending matter?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, since the Senator from New Mexico has interrogated me, let me say this: Here are two contracts; they are exactly the same—the Cat Creek contract and the Sinclair contract. They each contain an optional renewal clause. In one contract the constituents of the Senator from Montana are vitally interested; in the other contract others are interested. The Senator from Montana—let us say it is a routine procedure—interested himself—it may be his office, or his office force, but it is his influence, at any rate—in securing this contract or in any event aiding in its procurement. The contract is entered into by the Government. The Senator from Montana evidently knew what was going on in his own office. He therefore knew the contract was entered into by the Government and his constituents. The Senator from Montana, by his own statement, has just said that he was familiar to a degree with what was going on in 1922 when Fall let the two contracts, one to his constituents, the other to the Sinclair Co.

After this is done the office of the Senator from Montana, in 1923, writes to the department and asks for a copy of the contract. Let it be called routine. I am assuming the Senator knows something about what goes on in his office, and that he knew that contract was asked for and received with reference to a matter that was more or less vital. By this time the Teapot Dome matters were coming to the surface. I imagine the Senator reads some of the papers that come to his office before sending them on. I imagine further, then, that again, in 1927, when the Senator from Montana wrote to the Secretary of the Interior, Doctor Work, whom he now criticizes, and asked him for his interpretation of that identical contract, the Senator knew what he was doing; and that if the Senator's secretary wrote that letter over the Senator's signature, as a matter of routine, still the Senator from Montana must have known something about it, because his secretary would, at least, have given him some little information about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I regret that my argument should be interrupted in this way. I do not think it is quite fair.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Montana will not charge me with the blame. This question was suggested by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] and to the best of my ability I am trying to answer it.

Mr. BRATTON. I apologize to the Senator from Montana, and I shall refrain from any further interruption.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is all right; I do not object to interruption at any time for the purpose of asking a question and eliciting information, but I am sure the Senators will appreciate the unfairness of injecting a long speech in the midst of my remarks.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to preface my question with a statement. I think I understand exactly what the Senator from Montana has explained about the routine in his office. I am not casting any reflection; I think he probably proceeded just as he narrates the facts; it is something that happens to all of us; but I should like to ask the Senator this question: The letter which was signed in the Senator's name by his secretary went to Mr. Work. That was before he renewed the contract?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I think not.

Mr. NORRIS. My understanding is that it was. The point that I want to call to the attention of the Senator is that Mr. Work, whatever we may say and whether we agree or disagree as to whether he had sufficient advice or the proper advice before renewing that contract, had in his possession at the time he renewed it the letter written by the Senator's secretary, of which the Senator had no knowledge, but Mr. Work would be justified in concluding that the Senator himself signed it and that it was not signed by his secretary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. NORRIS. So, whatever it amounted to on its face, at the time he took this action he had at least the partial judgment of the Senator from Montana on the legality of the proposed renewal.

Mr. WALSH of Montana Yes; but there is no pretense—and that is a matter to which I want now to refer—that the Secretary of the Interior had my letter in mind at all when he renewed the contract.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator from Montana to say that the Secretary gave as his reasons for renewing the contract all these references, and they included the letter of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the Secretary did not give that as a reason; he made that as a justification for his having done so. That is what I want to speak about now.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Illinois will pardon me for just a moment, I want to call attention to the fact that there is not an iota of evidence here that the Secretary of the Interior ever even read the memorandum notes of Newman and Patterson. There is not any evidence in the record to show that he ever read the protest of anybody who protested against it. The whole thing was treated by him as a matter of routine and was left to his assistants. Now, I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I simply want to ask a question of the Senator from Montana, in order to obtain certain information and not for the purpose of embarrassment. I am not clear either from the record or from the statement of the Senator from Montana this morning as to this matter. Some reference has been made to the Salt Creek contract. The Senator from Indiana asked the Senator from Montana if he had studied it carefully, or something of that kind, and I believe the Senator from Montana answered "No." I should like to know whether the Senator from Montana had read that Salt Creek contract?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I never had.

Mr. GLENN. The Senator never did read it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I never did; nor did I ever read the Cat Creek contract.

Mr. GLENN. That is all I wish to know.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But even if I had read the Cat Creek contract, and even if I had seen therein a provision for its renewal, of what consequence is it? There was no duty devolving upon me in the premises at all; I was not called upon to go to my books at that time to find out whether that provision could be sustained or could not be sustained. I have other things to do; I have other obligations. It is the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to do these things, and not my duty. But, as a matter of fact, I never saw either of those contracts.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to emphasize the point that, although Doctor Work was examined with respect to this matter, he does not even pretend that he ever read the Newman and Patterson memorandum. He says that he relied upon the official advice that is provided for him by the Congress of the United States. That is not correct. The Congress of the United States has provided that the head of any department may at any time require the opinion of the Department of Justice on any question of law that may arise in the conduct of his office. Of course, it is not to be expected that the Secretary of the Interior will ask the Department of Justice for its opinion upon every question that comes up; but this was an extraordinary matter; it contemplated the disposition of national assets that would amount to more than $30,000,000; it concerned the renewal of a contract made by Albert B. Fall to Harry F. Sinclair, in substance, made in connection with the leases of the naval oil reserves, and modifying in an important particular the Teapot Dome lease. The facts would naturally suggest to the Secretary of the Interior that he ought to have the very best possible advice to be secured. He acts, however, upon the advice—and, as I have said, it does not appear that he even studied the opinions about the matter—of some subordinates in his office.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator mean to say he did not read the opinions at all?

Mr. WALSH of Montana There is no evidence that he did.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator believe that he did not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I believe he did not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator believes the Secretary of the Interior just sat down supinely and paid no attention whatever to it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That would appear to be the case from the evidence.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yet all those who had anything to do with this work and were charged with responsibility, even including the Senator, were unanimous in their opinion that the Government would have to renew the lease.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have indicated just what the facts are.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Now, the Senator means to suggest—I am just trying to find out exactly what he is trying to say—that the Secretary of the Interior did nothing at all but just sat there?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the evidence. It is the record here that the whole matter was handled by Mr. Finney, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior. It does not appear, I assert again, that the Secretary ever read an opinion about the matter or that he concurred in the views expressed by the solicitor of his department. That being the situation, the protest of the White Eagle Refining Co. comes in on the 11th day of April last, and on the 27th day of April, after Patterson had dissented from the view expressed by Mr. Kem, attorney for the White Eagle Refining Co., it is referred to the Department of Justice and goes to Colonel Donovan. Colonel Donovan refers it to Messrs. Kenyon and Chandler, and they, without even reading the cases cited in the protest, expressed to Mr. Finney the view that they concurred in his idea that there was nothing to it. Kem being active, calls Mr. Finney up on the telephone and asks him about the matter, and Mr. Finney tells Kem that the matter has been referred to the Department of Justice, and they are waiting for the opinion of the Department of Justice. However, the opinion does not come. Mr. Kem and his company are eager about the matter, and during the Republican convention at Kansas City, in the month of June, the president of the White Eagle Refining Co. takes the matter up with the chairman of the committee, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE]. Kem gets impatient again and calls Finney upon the long-distance telephone from Kansas City, and asks him about the matter. Mr. Finney tells Kem that the matter has been referred, and Kem asks for a copy of the solicitor's opinion, which, according to him, Mr. Finney promised to send, but never did send. Finney says that he does not recall anything of the kind, but if Mr. Kem says so, he has no doubt that it is correct, but he adds that in the department it is regarded that an opinion is not public until it is approved by the Secretary, and that perhaps later he thought of the rule and deemed it unwise to furnish it. That may be correct.

In any event, in the latter part of the month of August, four months having gone by, Colonel Donovan, to whom the matter was referred, first learned that the Department of Justice was ever asked for an opinion in the matter. He learns of it from a newspaper which he picks up on the train when he was away out in the remote West in New Mexico. He learns that the White Eagle Refining Co. has filed a protest. He gets back to Washington on the 24th day of August, 1928, and immediately sends for Kenyon and Chandler. He asks them what is there about the protest of the White Eagle Refining Co., and they tell him about it. Colonel Donovan asks that they put on his desk the cases or the reports containing the cases cited by Kem, which they do immediately. In the meantime, Chandler leaves the service, and Kenyon goes back to New York, where he is engaged in some business for the department. Kem, in the meantime, calls up Colonel Donovan at the Department of Justice. Finney had meanwhile written his letter asking when they might expect an answer to their request for an opinion, and apparently Colonel Donovan, having in mind the investigation into the fraud feature, says that the department has been making an exhaustive investigation of the facts; and it is now studying the facts; and he hopes to be able to report sometime soon. Of course this particular question, the right of renewal under the law, did not require an investigation of any facts at all. The whole thing was right there except the facts concerning the circumstances under which the contract was made. Colonel Donovan evidently referred to the investigation they had been conducting into the matter of fraud. Bear in mind that was the 28th day of August, 1928. Mr. Kem, however, comes here after calling Colonel Donovan on the telephone on the 15th day of September, 1928, some weeks after Colonel Donovan first learned about this matter. Up to that time Colonel Donovan had not read the cases cited by Kem, but he at once turns to Kenyon and tells him, "I think you fellows are wrong and that Kem is right about this. I want to go into the matter and study it with care." Kenyon then goes to work, and on the 8th day of October, 1928, he writes an exhaustive and elaborate and an able opinion fully sustaining the position taken by Kem.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Kem is one of the two young men the Senator spoke about a while ago?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; Kem is the attorney for the White Eagle Refining Co., practicing law formerly at Casper, Wyo., and now at Kansas City.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No, Mr. President; I was wrong about that. I mean Kenyon is one of the two young men the Senator spoke about?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; Kenyon is the man who first, without ever having read the cases, told Finney that he agreed with him. The matter was then left in abeyance for a period of four months, when he was finally jogged by Colonel Donovan to proceed with the investigation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The point I was getting at is that Kenyon is one of the two young men to whom the Senator referred a while ago?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. He is the same Kenyon and the same young man who wrote this very able and exhaustive opinion?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; the same man.

That is the 8th day of October. Meanwhile, Kem gets impatient about the matter and calls me up on the long-distance telephone from Kansas City and asks if he can come to Helena and talk to me about the Salt Creek oil-royalty contract. I set a day for him to come, and he arrives. He has a copy of his protest, with the authorities that he cited, and exposes his contention to be that although the Secretary had power to sell the oil he did not have the power to grant an option to purchase the oil. Upon an examination of the cases he cited—I was in my law office at the time—I quickly reached the conclusion that his contention was entirely sound. No progress having been made by him through either of the departments, it occurred to me that some publicity would be valuable; and I gave the whole story to the New York World, which published it on the 15th day of October, 1928. The next day—the next day!—an opinion was issued by the Department of Justice fully sustaining the position taken by Kem, and, in addition to that, supporting me in the view I took that the original contract itself was void because the contract entered into did not conform to the advertised conditions.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator complained that Secretary Work did not consult the Department of Justice.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator perhaps will recall that the failure of Mr. Fall to consult the Department of Justice when he made these deals was offered in evidence when the Government prosecuted Doheny and Sinclair.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite true; quite true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator says the opinion of the Department of Justice or the Attorney General was given publicity on the 16th day of October.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was signed on the 16th, but got into the papers on the 17th.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the Senator stated a while ago that Colonel Donovan had reached his conclusion in the matter, in accordance with what the opinion ultimately was, long before that date, or some time before that, and that Kenyon's opinion——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would appear that Colonel Donovan reached his conclusion, and said to Kenyon and Chandler, "I think you fellows are wrong," very promptly after the 15th of September; and it was not until a month and two days thereafter that the opinion came out, the Government of the United States losing a thousand dollars every day of the delay.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is, assuming that it is not ultimately recovered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the opinion of Kenyon appeared on October 8?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Therefore I assume the Senator does not mean to insinuate that the opinion came out on the 16th because of the article that appeared in the New York World.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will let each Senator draw his own conclusion about that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But what is the Senator's opinion about it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My opinion is, if the Senator desires to have my opinion about the matter, that it was forced by the publication in the New York World.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And if it had not been for the information given by the Senator to the New York World it never would have appeared?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That does not necessarily follow.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator feel that way about it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know any reason why the issuance of that opinion was delayed from the 8th of October until the 17th.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me find out just what the Senator's opinion is. When Colonel Donovan told his subordinates that they were all wrong in this matter, and that it ought to be changed, and that he had changed his views on it——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That who had?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Colonel Donovan—or, if he had not changed his views, in any event if he had no decided views before that he thought that his subordinates were all wrong——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On the 15th day of September he told Kem that he did not think Kem was right; that that was impracticable.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator means Kenyon?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No, no; on the 15th day of September Kem came from Kansas City and had an interview with Donovan. At that time Donovan said to him that his ideas were impracticable.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But, Mr. President, the Senator stated a while ago, and it is in the record, that Colonel Donovan did tell his subordinates that he thought they were all wrong.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And that, subsequent to that, on October 8 Kenyon's very able opinion did appear.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And that on the 16th——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I tried to recite those facts, and they do not get any more adequate by the repetition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator states that, in his opinion, if it had not been for the article in the New York World, the opinion would not have appeared?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My opinion about the matter is of no consequence here.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Except that the Senator's opinion is embodied in this minority report, in which he asks the Senate to censure these public officials.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is of no consequence here at all. I am not asking censure upon any such ground. I am asking censure of Doctor Work on the ground that he did not act with the circumspection that ought to have been exercised, that he took a perfectly puerile opinion of the solicitor and the chairman of the board of review, that he did not seek the advice of the Department of Justice in the first place, and that he did not even read the opinion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before the Senator asks another question, I should like to ask——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to answer the Senator from Indiana first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator mean to say that he does not think Colonel Donovan was sincere in his attitude before this opinion——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, I refuse to answer that question. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana, if the Senator from Montana will permit that to be done, to state what Colonel Donovan meant by saying that these subordinates were wrong. Did he mean by that that they should let these leases go ahead, that they were all right and proper?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, no. The Senator probably has not been here throughout the debate, or has not read the report carefully.

Mr. HEFLIN. I was called out of the Chamber and did not hear all of the debate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; if the Senator will permit me, this man Kenyon, a subordinate under Colonel Donovan in the Department of Justice, had been working on this case, but on a different theory of law—the question of fraud. Mr. Kem, who was counsel for the White Eagle Oil Co., subsequently appears before Colonel Donovan and convinces Colonel Donovan that the subordinates in the department probably are proceeding on the wrong theory of law. Colonel Donovan becomes convinced that Counsel Kem, of the oil company, is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Pardon me; the Senator has not stated the facts correctly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In what particular have I not done so? Just let me finish this, and then let the Senator from Montana correct me. Then Colonel Donovan says to these young men, the subordinates in his department, that he thinks they are wrong in the theory they have been following. That is as I understand it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then he was sustaining the leases, sustaining the people who got the oil, was he?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, no; they were proceeding on a theory of fraud long before that. It all appears in the record here.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the Senator from Indiana has not got it right. These young men were proceeding with their investigation of fraud, but the protest of Kem was referred to them, and they had expressed the opinion that Kem's contention was not correct——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is right.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not taking the pains even to look at the authorities he cited, and they told Colonel Donovan that they did not think the contention of Kem was correct; and eventually Colonel Donovan, not referring to the fraud theory at all but referring to their views of the Kem protest, told Kenyon and Chandler, "I think you fellows are wrong."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Referring to the fact that they did not agree with Kem's position and his theory.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the fraud theory did not enter into it at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But Colonel Donovan had been converted to the theory of Kem, and therefore suggested to his subordinates that, in his opinion, their attitude on the matter was wrong.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This is the situation——

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator from Alabama has been advised about the subject he wanted to be advised about or not. What the Senator from Alabama wanted to know, as I understood, was whether or not the position that Donovan took at the time to which the Senator from Alabama referred was that the renewal of the leases was legal. That was what the Senator wanted to know, was it not?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. GLENN. The position Donovan took at that time was that the renewal was illegal. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is correct.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wanted to know what Colonel Donovan's attitude was—whether he was on the side of the Government or on the side of Doheny or Sinclair.

Mr. GLENN. He was on the side of the Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to say that no member of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys has in the least degree questioned the recital of facts in this report. I think every member will agree that the facts are accurately stated in this report. There is a difference of opinion as to the conclusions properly to be drawn from that report.

I submit, in the first place, Mr. President, that Secretary Work did not exercise the circumspection with respect to the disposition of property of the Government of the United States to the amount of at least $35,000,000 that, under the circumstances, he ought to have exercised; in the second place, that if a request can come from one of the departments to the Department of Justice, and lie there for four months without the head of the Department of Justice even knowing of its existence, there is something wrong in that department. Moreover, Mr. President, I undertake to say there is not anybody who can say that Kenyon discharged his duty in this matter when he did not even look at the cases cited by Kem, which ought to be convincing to any lawyer who examines them. Then I submit that thereafter, when Colonel Donovan learned of this matter, in the latter part of the month of August, out in the State of New Mexico, some more prompt action than that which followed might reasonably be expected from him.

I do not know what kind of a standard of public service the Republican Party care to hold up to the country; but if this is a sample of what they regard as diligent and exacting attention to the public welfare, we are in rather a bad way, seeing that they are to have a further lease of life of four years.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, it would be difficult for the Republican Party to satisfy the Senator anyhow, would it not, no matter what it did?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I beg to say that if that means that the Senator from Montana is acting in this matter the part of a partisan, the Senator from Indiana probably does not know him quite as well as most of the Members of this body do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That was a general statement. I have never heard the Senator refer very kindly to Republicans anywhere, at any time, in the comparatively short time I have been a Member of this body.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I venture to say that I have been less a partisan in this body than most of those in it who enjoy the acquaintance of the Senator from Indiana; and I desire likewise to say that I have been equally critical of Democratic Attorneys General.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator has never had much to say in criticism of Mr. Doheny.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He has not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have not been able to find it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, Doheny is not a Democrat. Why, he is the worst sort of a Republican.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of Mr. Doheny?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Why, Mr. President, Mr. Doheny in 1920 contributed $75,000 to the Democratic campaign fund, and wrote the plank in the platform on oil and petroleum——

Mr. HEFLIN. And we kicked him out, and he went to the Republican Party. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And was formally nominated for Vice President in the Democratic National Convention. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I venture to say that that is rather irrelevant to the question under consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But I might likewise remark, seeing that Mr. Doheny is referred to, that the facts in relation to Mr. Doheny were developed with some diligence and painstaking labor upon the part of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I will only say on that score that when I get an opportunity to have the floor in my own right I should like to say some things about Mr. Doheny myself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. Doheny does not seem to be involved in the particular matter that is before the Senate now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Not in this matter, except that it is hard to talk of oil without mentioning Mr. Doheny.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I dare say the Senator from Indiana will do everything he can to divert the public mind from the question that is now before us.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Not in the slightest degree, Mr. President. I want the public mind to understand fully every single fact connected with this whole matter.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1437, to subject certain immigrants, born in countries of the Western Hemisphere, to the quota under the immigration laws.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I trust the Senator——

Mr. HARRIS. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have concluded, but if anyone else wants to debate this subject, I would like for him to have the opportunity.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If I should undertake at this time a presentation of my views with relation to the matter before the Senate, would I be interrupted at the hour of 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, at 2 o'clock the resolution now under consideration will be laid aside for the unfinished business, but the Senator would not be otherwise interrupted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask unanimous consent that the further discussion of this matter be continued without prejudice until the next day, when we will have morning business.

Mr. NYE. I should object to that, because, in view of the presentation that has been made here to-day, I should at least like to present my own views with relation to the matter.

Mr. FESS. A parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator desires to talk now, I shall certainly withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. NYE. I have no desire to force the matter to a conclusion at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio desires to propound a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FESS. When we reach the hour of 2 o'clock and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, that will not take the Senator from North Dakota from the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not take any Senator from the floor. A motion has been made by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. My motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1437.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator ought to permit the Senator from North Dakota to take the floor at this time to make a speech.

Mr. HARRIS. I was perfectly willing to let the Senator from North Dakota go ahead, but the Senator sat down and I thought he had no desire to speak at this time.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I am very sorry that I shall have to object. We have the prohibition measure as the unfinished business, and I have entered into an agreement in regard to that not to obstruct its passage in any way.

Mr. HEFLIN and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to have about five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. Do I have the floor, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia yields to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator from North Dakota expects to make a speech, will he yield to me for just about two or three minutes?

Mr. NYE. For what purpose?

Mr. HEFLIN. To say a word along the line of the speech of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. NYE. No; I think not at this stage.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frazier	McNary	Simmons
Bayard	George	Mayfield	Smith
Bingham	Gerry	Moses	Smoot
Black	Gillett	Neely	Steck

Mr. FESS. My colleague [Mr. BURTON] is detained from the Senate by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr, BLEASE. Mr. President, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. BLEASE. I have no desire to make a speech at this time, and I have no desire to take the Senator from North Dakota off the floor, but there is presented now a point I have been wanting to have settled for some time, and now that the opportunity has arisen, I would like to have the matter settled.

A few moments ago the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] was recognized and had the floor. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] rose and the Senator from Georgia yielded to him. The Senator from North Dakota rose to propound a parliamentary inquiry, which was whether if he should speak until 2 o'clock on the Walsh resolution he would be taken off the floor at 2 o'clock when the unfinished business was laid before the Senate.

The temporary Presiding Officer held that the Senator from Georgia had the floor. The Senator from Alabama was on his feet asking for recognition. The Senator from Georgia yielded to the Senator from North Dakota for the purpose of making a speech. I want to inquire whether a Senator has the right to gain the floor and yield the floor to another Senator to make a speech, or if that recognition should not come from the Chair. I have seen such a practice followed here now for some time.

As I understand it, a Senator may yield the floor for the purpose of allowing another Senator to ask a question, or to inject possibly some short remark, but I understand, the Senator from Georgia did not have the right, under the rule, to yield the floor to the Senator from North Dakota while the Senator from Alabama was on the floor asking recognition of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair is not familiar with the circumstances to which the Senator refers, not being in the chair at the time. Recognition of a Senator is a prerogative of the Presiding Officer. A Senator can not yield to another Senator for the purpose of enabling that other Senator to make a speech.

Mr. BLEASE. As I said, I have no idea and no wish to take the Senator from North Dakota from the floor, but he has not the floor in his own right until he has been recognized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have been a little surprised listening in on this debate to-day, because having given close study to the report offered by the Senator from Montana, I assumed that certainly there were going to be some qualifying statements offered by the Senator which would make his report more acceptable to me than it has been. I find, though, after having listened to the debate this morning, that the matter as presented to the Senate in the report, and the conclusions which have been drawn by a great many in the Senate, and by myself, and the conclusions which certainly have been drawn by a great many newspapers and people outside of the Senate, are more in keeping with the conclusions which were mine when I declined to concur in the report when it was presented to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2901) to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, rather than to appear as quibbling over minor questions, I shall not now question the very unusual situation which brings the Walsh report before the Senate and asks for the judgment of the Senate upon that report. I want now to say only that had I been present when the report was presented, I should have objected to its being submitted as a report from the committee, since no report of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys had been authorized by it.

By virtue of the resolution offered by the Senator from Montana, in conjunction with the presentation of his report, the Senate is virtually asked to pass judgment upon a matter that is not properly before it. But I shall not raise the point of order. I would, however, call to the attention of the Senate at this time the fact that the report is not strictly in response to any order or request contained in Senate Resolution 202 under which the committee has been working in its investigation of leases and contracts in the Salt Creek field. The committee has not formally authorized a report upon this subject. Yet the Senate has before it now a report submitted by Senator WALSH relating to the subject of the Sinclair royalty oil contract. I have no objection to the points raised in that report being aired here on the floor of the Senate, but would much prefer that there had been opportunity afforded to have submitted to the Senate a report upon this subject which was acceptable to a majority of the committee. Then, and only then, to my mind would the Walsh report be properly in order.

No one is fair who says that no such majority report as I have suggested would have been prepared and authorized. Mindful of the duty of the committee to report to the Senate, I should certainly have seen to it that a report in keeping with the orders contained in the Senate resolution was prepared, acted upon by the committee, and reported to the Senate.

Such a report, in the face of committee findings, would not have been, with my aid and consent, one necessarily free from criticism of the Departments of Justice and Interior, which are involved in this controversy, but it would most assuredly be devoid of that measure of censure which has been accorded in the Walsh report. Such a report as I have in mind and as being occasioned by the facts in the case should contain a review of the findings of the committee with relation to the Sinclair royalty oil contracts in keeping with the expressed wishes of the Senate as contained in its resolution. The wish of the Senate is certainly not complied with in the Walsh report and the Senate is not, when asked to pass judgment upon this report, called upon to determine any point which is in keeping with the resolution.

The Walsh report and the resolution which accompanies it require the Senate to determine the degree of censure, if any, properly owing the Departments of Justice and Interior and such individuals within those two departments as have had any hand in the renewal of the royalty oil contract a year ago and its final cancellation last October.

I admit that there have been developments which make a report upon the Salt Creek royalty oil contract quite in order, but it should be here noted, Mr. President, that the matter of this contract never received any study by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys until after the Department of Justice ordered the contract canceled as being illegal and until after the Department of the Interior had canceled the contract. In other words, the committee gave no study to the question until after fulfillment of that duty which the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys itself last spring intrusted to the study and judgment of the Department of Justice, at the suggestion, I might add, of the Senator from Montana.

I sincerely wish that this entire matter were not before us in its present shape. The Committee on Public Lands and Surveys is far from through with its oil investigations, much work remains to be done, and to accomplish best results there ought not be a break within the committee itself, for very much depends upon the ability of the committee to present a united front. Above all else, the good will and continued enthusiastic cooperation of the author of the resolution now before us is altogether desirable, not only desirable but quite thoroughly essential. I therefore hesitate in becoming involved in this controversy in any manner and I should remain quite silent were it not for the fact that my silence would seem cowardly. I can therefore but hope that, with the difference of opinion which is involved in the present controversy finally satisfied in a degree by action on the part of the Senate, the committee can be found proceeding again in an energetic and united manner in the prosecution of its investigation into other angles involved in the Salt Creek field.

I can not now remain silent, Mr. President, since grounds so wholly unreasonable have been ascribed as the cause for my choice in declining to concur in the Walsh report, which was rejected by vote of the committee and which is now before us.

I resent, Mr. President, the conclusion which I am sorry to have to admit has been drawn by some, a conclusion to the effect that those of us who declined to concur in the Walsh report were moved by a desire to shield departments of Government or departmental officials and acts of a questionable nature, or moved by a partisan prejudice.

I have never hesitated, and never will hesitate, to condemn wrongdoing on the part of any man or any department no matter what party label that man may wear or no matter what partisan flag the administration of that department may be operating under. I shall always criticize and seek remedies wherever I find a public trust betrayed or poorly served, and as a Member of the Senate I have entertained at least one fixed and steady purpose, namely, that of keeping my head above the clouds of and myself removed from the swirls of partisan prejudice or from that measure of party obligation which too often blinds men to what is right and what is wrong. I yield to no man greater sincerity of purpose than is mine in this regard, and I believe that my record demonstrates that sincerity of purpose.

I deny and I resent the charge, thought, or insinuation that I was moved by any prejudice or any political motive in declining to concur in the Walsh report. It undoubtedly would have been more popular to have concurred with Senator WALSH in his report, particularly since one whom his report criticizes has made it so difficult for one to defend him, as Mr. Work, former Secretary of the Interior, has made such a defense in his behalf difficult by an attitude which, in at least one case, brought him no credit. Mr. Work's pronouncement, for instance, that these oil matters ought to be forgotten, and that the people were sick and tired of reading of them, is hardly becoming a man who is placed in official position which ought to demonstrate him occupied with the encouragement of clean government and not of endeavoring to subdue those who did exert honest effort toward its accomplishment. No man can seem to waive aside these oil-scandal investigations as wasted effort and as being of little importance and accomplishment and expect in return that full measure of confidence to which he may be entitled when an act of his is questioned, particularly if that act is in any wise connected with the oil scandals themselves.

But, regardless of any popular attitude on the question, regardless of whether my position is popular or not, I could not concur in the Walsh report for the simple reason that its conclusions did not square with mine after a close acquaintance with the facts relating to the cancellation of the Sinclair royalty-oil contract.

Bearing in mind that this matter under discussion has nothing whatever to do with the acts of Mr. Work, Mr. Donovan, Mr. West, or any other person connected with the two departments of government involved other than those acts which had to do with the renewal and cancellation of this Salt Creek royalty-oil contract, it is well to here at least roughly review the history of those particular transactions.

In December of 1922, Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall, whose record in the conduct of these oil leases and contracts is defended by none who are removed from any possible influence of the Sinclairs, the Dohenys, the Stewarts, and their ilk, entered into a 5-year contract for the sale of the crude oil accruing from Government lands in the Salt Creek field to the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. Included in this contract, it afterwards developed, was a clause providing for a renewal at the end of five years at the option of the purchaser. At virtually the same time a like contract was made by Fall relating to royalty oil in the Cat Creek field in Montana, it containing the same identical option clause contained within the Sinclair contract.

It has since been developed that the advertisements for bids offering this royalty oil for sale did not contain any mention of a privilege to renew the contract at its expiration, a provision which was included within the Sinclair contract, however, leaving it reasonable to draw the conclusion that there may have been a secret understanding between Fall and Sinclair which was to give this unadvertised privilege of option to Sinclair.

But it is unfair to cause one to believe that the content of these renewal clauses in the contracts was kept a dark secret after they had been entered into. The record, in fact, discloses that in November, 1923, at the request of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, information openly disclosing the content of the option clause in the Sinclair contract was furnished by the Department of the Interior to that committee and printed in the record of the hearings then being conducted. Thus the information became available at least to all members of the committee and to all who would read the record of those hearings.

The record also discloses that on January 22, 1923, Senator WALSH wrote Secretary Fall asking for a copy of the Cat Creek contract, which contained an option clause like that in the Sinclair contract, a contract in which certain of his Montana constituents were interested, and in whose behalf as constituents the Senator counseled with Secretary Fall to win for them a contract which would give them a supply of crude oil in the Cat Creek field. The copy of the contract requested was furnished.

It is also a matter of record that on January 17, 1927, a year before the contract was renewed by Secretary Work, the Senator directed a letter to the Secretary of the Interior asking for his construction upon the renewal-option clause contained in the Cat Creek contract, and that the Secretary responded on January 26, 1927, saying that it was the department's opinion that the holder of the contract in question would be entitled to renewal under the terms of the contract.

Thus it is seen that there was no effort made to conceal the content of the option clause within these contracts.

The record further discloses that on February 17, 1928, Senator WALSH wrote one W. G. Williams, saying therein that he could not understand how the Government could expect to escape the obligation of renewing the Sinclair contract, and that in his opinion the Secretary would be bound to renew it, under the terms of the contract, if the Sinclair option were exercised. It should, in fairness, be noted here that in that same letter the Senator declared that while such was his opinion, he had not been able to give the subject the study it ought to have in order to arrive at a conclusion such as would be reached by a good lawyer after a careful study.

In further fairness to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], it should be known, as he has made it known in his report, that this correspondence, except for that with Williams, was conducted, in fact, by his secretary, over the Senator's signature, without the Senator having knowledge of the content of this correspondence carried on in behalf of a constituent. This is a practice, I am sure, in which we all indulge more or less in the press of work in our offices.

I recite these facts not for the purpose of questioning the motives of or compromising the Senator from Montana in any manner, but only to show that there was no seeming effort on the part of the Department of the Interior to keep the renewal clause a dark secret and to demonstrate that the validity of the option clause was not questioned during any of this earlier consideration by those to whose attention had come the contract itself and the renewal proposal. And I can not find that the point of lack of conformity between the advertisement for bids and the contract awarded Sinclair as a result of the bidding was definitely and seriously raised before late in September of 1928.

The original Salt Creek contract was for a period of five years dating from January 1, 1923, and would therefore expire January 1, 1928. On June 7, 1927, written notice was given by the holder of the contract to exercise the privilege of renewal in conformity with the terms of the contract. The contract was renewed by Secretary Work on February 20, 1928, after bond had been provided, after the requested renewal had been approved by the director of and others connected with the Geological Survey, the Solicitor for the Interior Department, and the First Assistant Secretary, and after every opportunity had been given those who protested against the petition to present reasons why the contract should not be renewed. Again, let it be noted that the point of lack of conformity between the advertisement and the contract had not then been raised. Criticism is offered of the procedure followed at this point, and the Secretary of the Interior is held lacking in care and diligence in not having submitted the petition of the purchaser for renewal to the Attorney General for an opinion and in having left responsibility of this important matter to subordinates in the Department of the Interior.

As to the readiness of Secretary Work to leave the matter to those officials in his department who were charged with specific duties in connection with such matters, I feel that the Secretary did what is generally done in such cases and that far less blame than is implied in the rejected report attaches to him because of that course. That the Secretary did not doubt the necessity of renewal is not strange, in view of the fact that there was utter absence of any protest against the renewal based upon the ground that the original contract with Sinclair was invalid, since its terms did not comply with the advertisement for bids or upon the ground that the Secretary had no right to grant an option, and it was this ground which formed the final basis for cancellation of the contract.

I am ready to agree that care and diligence were assuredly lacking on the part of the solicitor of the department when the matter was submitted to him. It appears first that he did not give the matter more than passing consideration, but close study of the record would lead one to believe that when the solicitor was asked for an opinion on the question of renewal, though the solicitor offered his opinion on the following day, he had in fact given the matter study through several days and was thus prepared to render such opinion as he did upon very short notice. I feel, too, that care and diligence were lacking in a degree when Secretary Work failed to avail himself of the advice of the office of the Attorney General before renewing the contract. While it is problematical, in the absence of positive protest based upon the lack of conformity between the successful Sinclair bid and the advertisement for bids, that the office of the Attorney General would have reached any other conclusion at that time than was reached by the Interior Department, it does seem to me that the great and prominent attention which was nationally given to the question of the Sinclair deals, and the magnitude of the amount involved in the contract and its intended renewal, would have prompted a man occupying the place of Secretary of the Interior to have utilized in the fullest the available advice of the Justice Department in connection with any matter in which the Sinclair interests were involved, and this no matter how apparent the rights of parties concerned might have been on the face of the contract or other agreement.

However, in the absence of proof to indicate an unworthy purpose on his part, fairness would seem to dictate the admission that Secretary Work, in relying upon the advice and views of his subordinates, acted in good faith and did precisely what we are ready to admit ourselves doing, namely, leave matters to subordinates in our offices.

Mr. BLAINE and Mr. WALSH of Montana addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NYE. I yield first to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to ask the Senator a question at this point. After the Secretary of the Interior knew of the Teapot Dome scandal, of the jury trials within the shadow of his office, and of the debates of the Senate of the United States, was it not his official duty to use extraordinary care and diligence in connection with anything that smelled of Teapot Dome or Salt Creek or any other Federal oil reserve?

Mr. NYE. I have just so argued, Mr. President.

Mr. BLAINE. So that it was his duty to use extraordinary care. Can that lack of extraordinary care and diligence be excused under the circumstances?

Mr. NYE. I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the contract in question involves the disposition of assets, as I have said, of upward of $30,000,000. If the Secretary of the Interior does not give his attention to that kind of business, to what particular kind of business does the Senator think he ought to give his attention?

Mr. NYE. The Secretary did precisely what the Senator said in a letter to one W. G. Williams he assumed the Secretary had done. More than what I have just recited, I find in the letter of Senator WALSH written to Mr. Williams a reason to pardon Mr. Work for having accepted the advice of his counsel. Senator WALSH, who is doubtless the ablest attorney in the country on law involved in these oil-land questions, told Williams, when Williams complained against the Sinclair renewal, that it was his judgment that the contract would have to be renewed; that he could not understand how the Government could escape the obligation to renew. He said further that he had not fully studied the proposition, but assumed that the Secretary had taken the advice of his counsel. Let it be noted that Mr. Work was not a lawyer, and that he did not rely upon his own judgment, untrained in law, and that he did rely upon the advice of his counsel, just as Senator WALSH implied he ought to have done.

There was not anything said in the letter of the Senator from Montana to the effect that he assumed the Secretary had taken the advice of the Attorney General but that he assumed that he had taken the advice of the counsel who are supplied him in his office. That point seems to me to be altogether essential. If we are going to find that any degree of censure at all attaches in this connection, I think we ought to take that point very carefully into consideration. I am not arguing that the Senator from Montana felt at the time that the Secretary ought to have prevailed upon the Department of Justice to render an opinion, but that he, just as the Secretary himself had done, did not avail himself of that opportunity to gain the opinion of the department.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not care to say anything further about that matter. I think I have made it sufficiently clear. I rose, however, simply because of the statement made by the Senator from North Dakota that in this matter the Secretary, as is customary, relied upon his subordinates to take care of the situation; that is to say, he did not give it his personal attention but turned it over to his subordinates. I merely ask the Senator if the Secretary ought not to give his personal attention to this particular matter, involving the disposition of approximately $35,000,000 worth of assets, to what kind of a question should he give his attention?

Mr. NYE. I have already said that I felt that a degree of censure was owing Doctor Work for not having availed himself of the advice of the Department of Justice, but when we bring it down to a fine point, in all fairness I think we ought to be reasonable and show what was motivating the Secretary of the Interior at the time, and, in the absence of any show of a motive unworthy in the course that he pursued at that time, then, more than ever, do we owe it to him to be reasonable in our judgment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I merely wish to observe that the question was promptly referred by Doctor Work to the Department of Justice, and attorneys in the Department of Justice agreed with those in the Department of the Interior. Only afterwards, and considerably afterwards, on presentation of other theories of law by Mr. Kem, was there any change in the view. So Doctor Work did everything he could be expected to do.

Mr. NYE. I would not agree in toto with that, Mr. President. I do not think he did everything that could be reasonably expected of him. I feel that if I had been Secretary of the Interior, certainly in view of the great fuss and furore that had been created over the oil scandals, I would not have confined myself to the advice that was available to me in the Interior Department, but I should have sought the advice of the Department of Justice. I have, however, argued also that, in view of the absence of any direct ground upon which to base a protest against a renewal at that time, I doubt whether the Department of Justice would have come to any other conclusion than that reached by the solicitor in the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is the point I raised a moment ago. Is it not a fact that the Department of Justice agreed with the Department of the Interior in the matter?

Mr. NYE. Later on they did agree in the matter.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understand the Senator from Montana and the Senator from North Dakota have been discussing the views of the minority accompanying the so-called Walsh resolution. Beginning on page 13, at the bottom of the page, I find these sentences in the views of the minority:

> It is, however, less the province of this committee to justify either the view that the renewal contract is or that it is not sanctioned by the law as it is to determine whether the departments involved acted with the care, diligence, and promptitude to be expected of them. Whatever view may be taken of that question, it is indisputable that the Government has lost $300,000 and would have lost approximately $2,000,000 had not the counsel for the White Eagle Oil & Refining Co. come to its aid.
> It is the judgment of this committee that both departments are open to censure for the manner in which the feature of the public business herein canvassed was handled.

Are those the paragraphs in dispute between the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NYE. In an indirect way they are. I have construed those paragraphs to mean virtually that those in the Department of Justice and in the Department of the Interior who were connected with this matter are open to censure, and if it does not specify any certain individuals who are deserving of that censure, then all of those who had any hand in it are under the cloud of suspicion there. As I proceed with my argument this afternoon I hope to make that point much more clear than I have so far done.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thought the Senator had finished, and that is the reason I asked the question. I wanted clearly to understand, if I could, what was the particular bone of contention or difference of opinion between the Senators.

Mr. NYE. The bone of contention and the difference of opinion is the degree of censure owing to the Department of Justice and the Department of the Interior and individuals connected with those departments.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, would it interrupt the thread of the Senator's argument if I were to ask him a question?

Mr. NYE. Not at all.

Mr. WATSON. If the question should deflect the Senator too much from his chosen course, I will withdraw it. There are some of us—and I am one of them—who are not entirely familiar with all the facts, who would like to be informed. The Senator said that the Secretary of the Interior referred this matter in due course to his subordinates. Who were those subordinates; what positions did they hold; how long did they deliberate upon the question before they rendered a decision to the Secretary; how far did they go into it; and how much did they study it? I should like to know that.

Mr. NYE. The question was referred to the Assistant Secretary of the Interior; it was also referred to and passed upon by the Director of the Geological Survey.

Mr. WATSON. Who was the Assistant Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. NYE. The Assistant Secretary is Mr. Finney.

Mr. WATSON. How long has Mr. Finney been there?

Mr. NYE. He has been there in his present capacity I think since about 1920, and has been employed in the department for something over 20 years, if I recall correctly.

Mr. WATSON. I think he has been there for 25 years, possibly. To whom else was it referred?

Mr. NYE. To individuals in the Geological Survey. I think that was the extent of the reference.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would not interrupt the Senator, and did not intend to interrupt him——

Mr. NYE. If there are to be interruptions, I should much prefer to have them right at this point.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I gather from what the Senator has said, the only difference between him and the Senator from Montana is as to the degree—I think he used that exact language—of censure that should be accorded the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice or individuals in those departments.

Mr. NYE. Correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I understand that the Senator believes that they should be censured by the committee exactly as the Senator from Montana believes they should be censured, but that it is simply a question of the degree or the language to be employed in the censure.

Mr. NYE. No, Mr. President. At that point I suggest, as I will show further on in my argument, that I can not agree that any degree of censure is owing the Department of Justice. I would rather not discuss that matter at this stage.

Mr. JOHNSON. Surely. Then I misunderstood the Senator; and I think it will be wise to make that clear, because I believe others about me misunderstood him, too. The points of difference with the Senator from Montana, then, are, first, the Senator from North Dakota does not believe that the Department of Justice should be censured at all?

Mr. NYE. I shall make that point now.

Mr. JOHNSON. And secondly, as to the Interior Department, the Senator from North Dakota disagrees with the Senator from Montana in believing that the censure should be milder than that that is applied by the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NYE. May I put it in other words? I believe that censure is owing the Secretary of the Interior, censure is owing the Solicitor of the Interior Department, but, in all fairness to them, the facts ought to be brought out to show that there has been nothing brought into the record to indicate that there was anything unworthy or unclean in the motives which moved them when they were engaged in this transaction.

I think the conclusion that has been drawn as a general thing from the report submitted by the Senator from Montana has been the conclusion, first of all—I have not gathered that myself so directly as others have, but it has been drawn nevertheless—that the content within the contract which went to the Sinclair people of the option to renew was kept a dark and a great secret through all of these years, from the time it was entered into until within the last year, when all the evidence indicates that that was not the case at all; that there was never any effort made to conceal it; that the department gave out the information, gave out the contract and information about it, to all who might make inquiry for it. That it was not noted, that it was not observed, perhaps is not at all surprising.

Mr. WHEELER, Mr. GLENN, and Mr. JOHNSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield first to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator for some information.

As I understand, Fall's son-in-law came here and testified to the effect that Fall had received $10,000 down in New Mexico, and that he had received $25,000 on another occasion; and that testimony, as I find, was given here in Washington before the committee on January 24, 1928. That was all given to the newspapers, and the Department of Justice had that matter before it; and, notwithstanding the fact that it had the testimony of this prima facie showing of fraud, facts which only came to light when Everhart testified on January 24, the then Secretary of the Interior, Doctor Work, without consulting the Department of Justice, and without taking cognizance, as far as the record shows, of this evidence of fraud, renewed the contract to Sinclair on February 20, 1928, less than one month after these revelations, and notwithstanding the further fact that the evidence of Everhart showed that Fall had wired to Finney telling him not to be too strict, or something of the kind, about the Salt Creek contract.

Mr. NYE. Thanks to the Department of Justice for digging up that piece of information.

Mr. WHEELER. Likewise, in the face of this showing, it seems to me the Department of Justice was equally supine. Neither Donovan nor anybody else in the Department of Justice, so far as the record shows, took any action until nine months later, in mid-October, after my colleague had called attention to the situation, when an opinion was finally rendered.

Mr. NYE. No, Mr. President; the matter of the fraud involved and the exchange of any reward that ran between the Sinclair oil people and Mr. Fall was known to the Department of Justice, was dug up by the Department of Justice last March, and was being used as the basis of their action which they were building up to institute in the courts, such action as would win recovery of the profits which the Sinclair people had taken out of that field since the period when that contract was first entered into in 1923.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but let me understand: Does the Senator from North Dakota think, in view of that testimony, that Doctor Work should not have been criticized, for instance, and that he should not have given a great deal more attention to this matter than he did?

Mr. NYE. But, Mr. President, the committee, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] early last spring knew just as much about whatever measure of fraud existed there as the Department of Justice did.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes; but——

Mr. NYE. And yet the Senator, when he wrote Mr. Williams up here in New York, said he could not see how the department could escape the obligation of renewing that contract.

Mr. WHEELER. But is the Senator trying to shift the burden of responsibility for this contract now from Doctor Work over to the senior Senator from Montana?

Mr. NYE. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. WHEELER. There was quite a different responsibility resting upon the Senator from Montana in the letting of this contract than there was upon the Department of Justice and upon the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. NYE. Oh, a measure of difference; perhaps quite a degree of difference.

Mr. WHEELER. Not a measure of difference, but an entirely different responsibility.

Mr. NYE. But the fact that stands out is that there is no record, there is no evidence, of an improper motive driving Doctor Work at that time. If the Senator or anyone else will show me where Doctor Work had knowledge of the gross fraud that had been perpetrated there, and had entered into any sort of a secret agreement or an understanding which was to grant this renewal without due process of law, then I will readily join in a report that can not be too severe in criticism of that. As the record stands now, however, I can not hold Doctor Work any more responsible for that than others who had knowledge at that time such as was available to him.

Mr. WHEELER. He had absolute knowledge, did he not, that this money had been paid, and that after the money had been paid to Fall by Sinclair, Falf wired Mr. Finney suggesting that he give this contract to the Sinclair interests, practically, in substance?

Mr. NYE. Yes; but he also knew that the Department of Justice was at work on that very feature of the matter.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes; but, assuming that the Department of Justice was at work on it, suppose it had been put up to the Senator that fraud had been used originally, and that money had been paid in consideration of the issuing of the contract, would the Senator from North Dakota, if he had been Secretary of the Interior, have issued that contract?

Mr. NYE. Not without the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States substantiating it.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; and would the Senator, even though he had the opinion of some man in the Attorney General's office, without giving it very serious consideration himself aside from that, have issued it?

Mr. NYE. I think I would have had to, just as the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has maintained that the Secretary was bound to do it.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, well, the Senator is taking that from the letter that was written to New York? Is that it?

Mr. NYE. Precisely.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. There is nothing in the letter that would indicate that.

Mr. NYE. The letter did not indicate that?

Mr. WHEELER. Not at all.

Mr. NYE. The letter indicated just this—that on the face of the contract the Senator from Montana could not understand how the Secretary of the Interior could escape the obligation of renewing that contract. He had not given it the study, he had not given it the thought that a lawyer would before passing a good, final judgment upon it, but he assumed that Doctor Work, the Secretary of the Interior, had taken the advice of his counsel, and that is precisely what Doctor Work did, whether he had good or bad counsel.

Mr. WHEELER. It seems to me that the Members now defending Doctor Work are just grasping at a straw, at a letter that apparently was inadvertently written with reference to the matter, without any due consideration, for the purpose of justifying Doctor Work.

Mr. NYE. Does the Senator read into what I have read here this afternoon a justification, excuse, and whitewash of Doctor Work and his entire record in the handling of this thing?

Mr. WHEELER. It is a partial whitewash of him. I do not see how we can come to any other conclusion.

Mr. NYE. It is a partial whitewash if you are to concede the conclusion which has been mine, that the kind of a report which has come from the minority members of the committee is more severe than the facts in the case warrant.

Mr. WHEELER. I can not conceive how it could be more severe than the facts warrant, in view of the testimony of the corruption and debauchery of the Department of the Interior that had just been given by Everhart, who was Fall's son-in-law, where $25,000 was paid on one occasion and $10,000 was paid on another occasion.

Mr. NYE. I am not an attorney; but let us assume that there lay on the desk of Secretary Work, on the day that he granted the renewal of this contract, the evidence that there had been a transfer of money between Fall and Sinclair at the time this contract was made. Let us say that he went to the Attorney General and got the opinion of the Attorney General, which was along the line of the opinion which has been voiced by some individual, and that still, in spite of that, by virtue of the contract and in view of the absence of having passed judgment upon the element of fraud involved there—assuming all this, now—the Secretary then had debated the question of whether or not he should enter into that renewal. Would he not have had to enter into it?

Mr. WHEELER. Why, of course not; but let me put these facts in the RECORD first, so that there will not be any dispute in the minds of Senators as to just what the testimony was.

On January 24, 1928, Mahlon T. Everhart, Fall's son-in-law, testified before the Public Lands Committee for the first time. For four years he had refused to testify on the ground that to do so would tend to incriminate him.

He was then asked when he first met Sinclair He said (p. 63, pt. 1, hearings on S. Res. 101):

I was at Three Rivers at the time I met him.

Senator WALSH. When was that?

Mr. EVERHART. It was in October or November. I think November, 1922.

Senator WALSH. Do you recall the amount that you got at that time?

Mr. EVERHART. Not exactly; no.

Senator WALSH. I don't care for the exact amount.

Mr. EVERHART. It was around $10,000. I think it was. I am not sure of that.

Senator WALSH. What I want to know is how that payment was made, whether it was made in cash, by check, or how?

Mr. EVERHART. It was paid in cash.

Senator WALSH. Do you recall any other occasion when any amount was thus paid?

Mr. EVERHART. In January, 1923.

Senator WALSH. Where did that transaction occur?

Mr. EVERHART. I think it was in Washington, but I am not sure.

Senator WALSH. And do you recall the amount of that?

Mr. EVERHART. It was around—I think it was about $25,000, as near as I remember.

Senator WALSH. That was here in Washington?

Mr. EVERHART. Yes, sir.

Senator WALSH. Where was that paid to you?

Mr. EVERHART. I think in the Wardman Park Hotel. I am not positive about that. That is just my recollection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will my colleague suffer an interruption? It was intervening these two payments that this royalty oil contract of 1922 was executed.

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to bring that up.

Senator WALSH. Do you remember how the payment was made—in what form?

Mr. EVERHART. I think it was the same way.

Senator WALSH. In cash?

Mr. EVERHART. That was my recollection.

Senator WATSON. Mr. Sinclair was not carrying around $25,000 in cash on his person, was he?

Mr. EVERHART. You mean what he paid me?

Senator WALSH. Yes.

Mr. EVERHART. He certainly was, because I received it from him * * *.

Now, here is the significance of these dates. On January 24, 1928, it thus came to light for the first time that Sinclair had transmitted to Fall through the go-between, Everhart, $10,000 in cash in November of 1922 at his ranch at Three Rivers, N. Mex. It is a matter of record that Sinclair, upon leaving Three Rivers to return to New York, stopped at Pratt, Kans., and there filed a telegram to the Interior Department bidding in the name of the Mammoth Oil Co. for the Salt Creek royalty oil contract. That telegraphic bid was filed nine hours late; that is, nine hours after the time for filing the bids as advertised by the Department of the Interior had expired. The telegram reached Washington 11 hours after the filing time had closed.

The telegram reached Washington 11 hours after the filing closed, and then Fall, from Three Rivers, wired to Finney, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, not to be too formal about the handling of these bids. It was between the time he received the $10,000 and the $25,000 that this contract was signed, and that evidence came out on January 24, 1928. So that the department had all of that before it and knew that it was signed in the interim between the payment of the $10,000 and the $25,000, and how the Senator or anybody else can stand upon the floor of the Senate and, under those circumstances, defend Secretary Work and defend the Department of Justice for passing upon the contract and renewing the contract is beyond me.

Mr. NYE. I can do it just upon this basis: That the evidence is in the record that had the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] been Secretary of the Interior, he would have been content with the advice of the counsel in his office, and he said then that had he had the same knowledge of this measure of fraud that Secretary Work had he could not see how the Secretary could escape the obligation of renewing that contract.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would like to ask a question there to get a date straightened out.

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. What was the date when Everhart testified to the facts with reference to those payments of money?

Mr. NYE. I do not recall. I expect the Senator from Montana must have a reference to it there.

Mr. WHEELER. January 24, 1928.

Mr. BORAH. What was the date of the renewal of the contract?

Mr. NYE. February 20.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. February 20, 1928, 30 days afterwards.

Mr. WHEELER. Thirty days afterwards.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I was going to ask, if the Senator will permit an interruption, of the junior Senator from Montana——

Mr. WHEELER. I did not catch that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I was going to ask the junior Senator from Montana if he himself would be willing to take an opinion from his colleague the senior Senator from Montana on a legal question.

Mr. WHEELER. I would be perfectly willing to take his opinion on a legal question if I thought he was right upon it, but I would not unless I did, any more than—I was going to say any more than, but that would be doing my colleague an injustice; I was going to say any more than I would take the opinion of the Senator from Indiana. But it is a certainty that if the Senator from Indiana should pass upon it and say that this contract ought to have been signed under those circumstances, I would never take his opinion upon the question of whether or not this contract should be renewed as a matter of law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I was only going to observe that the senior Senator from Montana, three days before this renewal, on the 17th day of February, with all the facts in his possession of the Everhart testimony, assuming the Senator was acquainted with the facts, gave it as his opinion that he agreed with counsel of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. NYE. That is right.

Mr. WHEELER. Is that what the Senator is trying to do? As I said, both the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from North Dakota, it seems to me, are now doing nothing else except trying to draw a red herring across the trail and divert public opinion from the real issue in the case.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, no, Mr. President; the real issue in this matter goes back to the leases in 1920 and 1921. I will discuss them in my own time. I do not want to take the time of the Senator from North Dakota. But I understood the Senator a moment ago to say that that letter written by his colleague to a correspondent in New York, in which he gave him a definite opinion on this question, was inadvertently written.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know how it was written.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does he mean to say that his colleague gives opinions on important legal questions inadvertently?

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator knows perfectly well that that was not a legal opinion given.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That was the Senator's own statement.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no. I heard the letter read, and the Senator knows perfectly well that that was not a legal opinion written. It was a letter written in answer to some person in the State of New York who wrote to him and asked him something with reference to it.

Mr. NYE. And stating what he would have done had he been in the place of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not agree with the Senator at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. He assumed——

Mr. NYE. He assumed that the Secretary had taken the advice of his counsel.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana and Mr. SHIPSTEAD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Since this letter has been so much discussed, let us see exactly what it does say.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I ask, as a matter of curiosity, whether the Secretary of the Interior justified himself because of the action of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NYE. No; he has not done so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. This is——

Mr. WHEELER. It is just the Senator from Indiana who is doing that, not the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Montana comes in with a report censuring great executive departments of the Government because of something or other they have done which he does not like. The Senator from Montana seems to think they have committed grave faults for having changed their opinion on a question, for having changed their minds at some time or other.

This letter was written on the 17th day of February to a correspondent of the senior Senator from Montana in New York; and in that letter, written three days before the renewal of the lease, the Senator from Montana had the following to say:

Mr. W. G. WILLIAMS,
115 Broadway, New York.

DEAR SIR: I am not able to ascertain from your letter or the accompanying document just how you come to be interested in the lease of the Government royalty oil accruing to it from operations in the Salt Creek field. Will you kindly advise me?

I am unable to understand how the Government can escape the obligation to renew the contract with the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., except it treats it as void or voidable.

This is the "inadvertent" opinion the Senator gave in this letter referred to by his colleague from Montana.

It seems to me that neither the iniquities revealed as to the Teapot Dome lease or those that are unrevealed concerning the acquisition of the lands in the Salt Creek field by the Standard or its subsidiaries in violation of the leasing act can in any wise affect the validity of the contract by which the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. bought the Government's royalty oil. I regret to say—

Goes on this so-called "inadvertent" opinion—

I regret to say that I am obliged to agree with the Secretary that he is legally bound to renew, although I have not been able to give the subject the study it ought to have in order to arrive at a conclusion such as would be reached by a good lawyer after a careful study.

Mr. WHEELER. Well——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (reading):

I assume the Secretary has taken the advice of his counsel.

Which the Secretary testified he did do. The senior Senator from Montana was not familiar with this contract then, notwithstanding the fact that more than six years previously he had been interested in the negotiation of a contract exactly like this one, and had written, in 1923, for a copy of that contract with the Cat Creek people, which was precisely the same as this. Yet the Senator from Montana protects himself in this opinion given "inadvertently," as the Senator suggests, to this correspondent in New York, by saying that he has not had time to go into it carefully; but he had had all the time since the original contract had been gone into.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Now the colleague of the junior Senator from Montana would censure these two great executive departments because both of them did precisely what the senior Senator from Montana did—change their views——

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no,

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Changed their minds. That is all they did.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Even the colleague of the junior Senator admits, at least I understood him to say under questioning, that there was no intention of implying corruption here, and the Secretary of the Interior, Secretary Work, had nothing whatever to do with making the original lease by Fall to the Sinclair people and to the Cat Creek people. The Senator from Montana was closer to those transactions, really, than was the Secretary of the Interior, Doctor Work, because the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Wyoming were both there practically at the time, or just before, those two leases were executed by Fall, and the Senator from Wyoming testified that they were interested in a railroad to some degree coming from Montana down into Wyoming that might get some oil-carrying privileges. That is in the record here. So that afterwards the colleague of the junior Senator from Montana changed his mind and concluded that perhaps after all he had been mistaken. So did Doctor Work; or, rather, Doctor Work left the department months ago, but those in the department did, and the Department of Justice even changed its mind on additional argument brought to bear, with a different theory, by counsel for a private oil company, a competitor of the Sinclair people.

As I get it, the senior Senator from Montana would censure—for it would have the force of censure by this great body of the Government, the United States Senate—these executive departments for doing what? Precisely what the Senator from Montana has done, changing their minds, and taking and accepting the opinion of counsel on the question at issue.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I decline further to yield on this point. Everyone is going to have a chance in his own time.

Mr. BLAINE. I would like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question.

Mr. NYE. If I should yield to the Senator to ask a question of the Senator from Indiana, the Senator from Indiana would prolong this thing still further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, with relation to the contract and the responsibility of the Department of the Interior and its Secretary during the administration of Doctor Work, I can not hold a complete brief. I can not completely excuse them for their conduct accompanying the matter of this renewal. I think, I have always felt, that that ought properly to have been referred by the Secretary to the Department of Justice. What the result might have been, what the Department of Justice would have found, is not for me to say. Yet I feel that he did not exhaust all avenues of information which a man ought to have gone into before entering into so vital a thing as the renewal of this contract really was.

It seems to me that the real nucleus of the report submitted by the Senator from Montana is that ever-recurring thought that something in the nature of a conspiracy existed between the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice, a conspiracy that was to smother and to keep this contract from coming to a point where it could be canceled.

Among those conclusions, Mr. President, which have been drawn following my refusal to concur in the Walsh report is that one to the effect that I was desirous of shielding the Assistant Attorney General, William Donovan, because of the possibility of his appointment to the Cabinet of the new administration. I deny most emphatically and resent that charge, as I have the others. The facts are that I have not determined, nor even considered, what course would be mine in the event the name of Mr. Donovan were sent to the Senate for confirmation of his appointment to a Cabinet position.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Where was that charge made?

Mr. NYE. It has been a repeated charge in the press.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Not in the report?

Mr. NYE. Oh, no; not in the report.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. Perhaps the Senator from North Dakota refers to the caption over an article in the New York World of Monday, October 15, 1928.

Mr. NYE. That is among them.

Mr. GLENN. It reads:

Salt Creek oil deal with Sinclair Co. is attacked as invalid. Senator WALSH charges "conspiracy of silence" to cover up then Secretary Work's renewal of contract made by Alfred B. Fall.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have not, as I have said, determined what my course would be if that appointment came to the Senate for confirmation. But if my course was to be determined alone upon the basis of what is known of Mr. Donovan's conduct of the case of the cancellation of this royalty-oil contract, I would most assuredly support his confirmation, and do it gladly, and in the spirit of one who believed that the duties which would fall to Mr. Donovan in that capacity would be splendidly cared for, for in connection with the matter of the cancellation of this Sinclair contract, to my knowledge, and according to my sincere belief, Mr. Donovan has played squarely with the interests of the Government in every way, shape, and manner.

Differing, as I do, with the criticism of Mr. Donovan implied in the report, and certainly conveyed to some by the report, so also do I object to that measure of censure which seems directed against two young attorneys who were brought into the oil investigations in March, 1928, Messrs. Kenyon and Chandler. One can not have had the contact with these two men which members of the committee have had and be convinced of other than that they possess a splendid degree of ability, and a clean and altogether splendid desire on their part to ferret out the real facts and present them without prejudice. I am convinced of their complete sincerity of purpose and their desire to prosecute those guilty of wrongdoing in connection with these oil matters, and I object strenuously to their being brought under any cloud of suspicion, no matter how slight that cloud might be.

Kenyon and Chandler, up to March, 1928, had for some months been employed as special assistant United States attorneys in New York. In March of 1928, the charges of one W. G. Williams were laid before the President of the United States, these charges being that gross frauds were involved in the disposition of royalty-oil rights in the Salt Creek field. There was no reference in this correspondence, be it noted, to the lack of conformity between the advertisement for bids and the Sinclair contract. The President transmitted this letter and such papers as had been sent him to the Attorney General under date of March 2, ordering a thorough investigation made of the entire question and the taking of such action as the department would find warranted by the facts and the law to insure thorough protection of the rights of the United States.

Assistant Attorney General Donovan, upon receiving this assignment, called to his aid these two attorneys, Kenyon and Chandler, and caused to be turned over to them the papers submitted by Williams and voluminous files from the Interior Department touching upon the matter. This was on March 27, 1928. Thereupon Kenyon and Chandler immediately and enthusiastically delved into the questions which had been raised and sought first to determine just what their line of procedure should be. They conferred with Senator WALSH and in a general way sought to arm themselves with all possible facts and angles which might be involved in the subject of their studies. Primarily, their investigation became one involving the question of fraud in connection with the Sinclair royalty-oil contract. The attorneys hoped, as they voiced themselves frequently to members of this committee, to show that fraud was attendant upon the entering into of the original contract for this royalty oil and that there was, at that time, wrong practice between the Sinclair interests and the then Secretary of the Interior, Albert B. Fall.

The question of the lack of conformity between the advertisement for bids on the Salt Creek royalty oil and the contract finally entered into between Fall and Sinclair after the opening of these bids was not in any manner involved, in the minds of these attorneys. The point had not been called to their attention, and it is not known that anyone had given that point any serious thought.

Late in April, or about a month after Kenyon and Chandler had set out upon their fraud investigation, Assistant Secretary of the Interior Finney submitted to the Department of Justice the complaint of the White Eagle Oil Co., which was then protesting against the renewal of the contract for sale of the royalty oils in Salt Creek. Accompanying this protest were affidavits, opinions of the Solicitor of the Interior Department, and such other papers as might apply. However, it should be again noted that in the protest of the White Eagle Oil Co. there was no mention made of the possible invalidity of the renewal contract or the original contract on the ground of lack of conformity between the proposal for bids and the Sinclair bid itself.

The letter of the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior was addressed to Hon. William J. Donovan, Assistant to the Attorney General. When the letter, with the accompanying papers, reached the Department of Justice, in the sorting of the mail it was considered that this was a matter to which Kenyon and Chandler were giving their full time and attention, and instead of the letter being delivered to the desk of Mr. Donovan it was delivered to Kenyon and Chandler, Donovan knowing nothing of its existence until late in August.

In the report submitted by Senator WALSH, in the first paragraph, at the top of page 9, appears this language:

Just how it can possibly come about that a request from another department of the Government for an opinion pursuant to the provisions of section 304, Title V, United States Code, may not reach the responsible head of that department, or for months after it is received, has not been explained to the committee.

Section 304, to which this report alludes, provides as follows:

The head of any executive department may require the opinion of the Attorney General on any question of law arising in the administration of his department.

It therefore occurs to me that there is hardly any explanation needed of why this particular correspondence from Assistant Secretary Finney did not reach Mr. Donovan, for it is apparent on the face of the letter of Mr. Finney, the Assistant Secretary, to Mr. Donovan that a statutory opinion was not required.

Section 304, referred to, stipulates, it will be noted, that the head of any executive department may require the opinion of the Attorney General. Mr. Finney was not the head of any executive department. Consequently, I am caused to feel that the section of law to which the Walsh report refers is not at all applicable to this particular inquiry, the request coming from the Department of the Interior over the signature of the Assistant Secretary, and that the Department of Justice upon receiving the letter had no reason to believe that the request was for an opinion in keeping with the statute referred to.

Kenyon and Chandler, after casual study of the correspondence which came to their desk from Secretary Finney, considered the material in a general way primarily as being only more material for what they then considered their straw pile of information which was to be combed in their study of the greater question of fraud involved in their royalty oil contract investigation. However, they took the matter up in person with the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Finney, who concurred with the opinion which had been submitted by the solicitor for the department, and which had been read by Kenyon and Chandler, said opinion holding that there was no merit in any protest against the right of the Secretary of the Interior to grant an option. Again, it must be noted that the question of conformity between the proposal for bids and the Sinclair bid itself was not raised or before the Interior Department, the Department of Justice, or Kenyon and Chandler.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The position the Senator takes, as I understand it, is that because it was not signed by Doctor Work, but was signed by Finney, that then the Department of Justice had a perfect right to refuse to render any decision at all.

Mr. NYE. Not at all, Mr. President; but such an opinion as is supposed as having been required in the report submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was not actually required.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator want to excuse the Department of Justice?

Mr. NYE. Not at all, and I am not going to do so if the Senator will bear with me just a moment.

Kenyon and Chandler, upon finding the Assistant Secretary of the Interior in agreement with the solicitor of the department, verbally expressed themselves as of the opinion that the solicitor was right in his conclusion. To use Mr. Kenyon's own language, in arriving at this conclusion they took—into consideration the fact that the Solicitor of the Interior Department is the official of the Government who is charged with knowing what the laws mean which affect his department. We took into consideration the fact that the contract had been published since 1923. Both the advertisement and the contract itself had been before the committee, had been before the President's special counsel, and had been a matter of public notice for anybody to object to it if there was an invalidity appearing on its face. We took all of those elements into consideration making against the contention. We knew you [Senator WALSH] had written the letter to Mr. W. M. Williams—

Which letter was the one in which the Senator had expressed the opinion that the Secretary of the Interior was bound to renew the Sinclair contract. Now, again I quote Mr. Kenyon:

Thereupon, to make certain whether or not I was right in my judgment at that time, I got in touch with Secretary Finney, and I said, "This letter has come. Your solicitor says the contention is not good. I am inclined to agree with him, but I want to find out what you think."

And he said:

"I think the solicitor is right."

That confirmed me; that confirmed me in our opinion at that time on what we had before us, that the solicitor was right.

All of this time, be it noted, the point of the lack of conformity between the advertisement for bids and the content of the Sinclair contract had never been directly raised nor did it come then to the minds of Kenyon and Chandler, who considered the submission to them of the complaint of the White Eagle Oil Co. only more material which they would have to thoroughly study in connection with their fraud case.

The first thought concerning this lack of conformity between the proposal and the bid of Sinclair occurred to Donovan or Kenyon not earlier than September 15. Donovan, while in the West, had read of the complaint of the White Eagle Oil Co., and immediately upon his return to Washington summoned Mr. Kenyon from New York on August 28. Mr. Donovan had a very inaccurate idea of what the White Eagle Oil Co.'s complaint was all about and wanted to know from Kenyon of it. Kenyon told Donovan then that he did not believe that there was anything of merit in the White Eagle Oil Co.'s complaint. Donovan scored Kenyon quite severely for not having previously brought the matter to his attention and insisted that the matter be laid before him for study and that Kenyon devote himself aggressively to the fraud case which they were building against Sinclair and Fall.

On September 1, upon receipt of a letter from Mr. Kem, attorney for the White Eagle Oil Co., Mr. Donovan wrote Mr. Kem inviting him to Washington to discuss the case of his people. Mr. Kem came to Washington on September 14. Mr. Donovan caused Mr. Kenyon to return to Washington from New York once again to give attention to this White Eagle Oil Co.'s complaint. Mr. Donovan saw Kem on the 14th and told him to go over the matter fully with Mr. Kenyon, who would arrive later in the day. For two hours on that day Mr. Kem and Mr. Kenyon conferred. After the 15th of September, the point of lack of conformity between the proposal for bids and the bid of the Sinclair people first came to the mind and attention of Kenyon and Donovan, or both, and Donovan ordered everything else dropped in favor of an intense study of this lone point.

Mr. Kenyon had a case which had to be looked after for the Government in court at Cincinnati and this held his attention until September 26. Immediately following this he devoted himself to the question of the validity of the Sinclair contract and its renewal with his mind on the fact that the advertisement for bids made no reference to an option, while the contract itself was caused to include the privilege of option to the Sinclair people.

The Senator from Montana said the report was referred to Mr. Donovan on September 8. The fact of the matter is that the opinion was dated in New York on the 8th and was laid on the desk of Mr. Donovan in Washington on the 10th.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator spoke about the advertisement for bids. That did not make any reference to an option, did it?

Mr. NYE. The advertisement for bids did not.

Mr. BORAH. Did the statute make any provision for an option being given in case of advertising for bids?

Mr. NYE. It has been held now that the Secretary had no right to grant such an option at all.

Mr. BORAH. I made the inquiry for the reason that it seems to me the entire trouble starts from the proposition that there was an error of law in the beginning as to what the statute covered.

Mr. NYE. Yes; the Senator is quite right.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds will he yield to me?

Mr. NYE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have paid what I think is a just tribute to Mr. Kenyon's opinion of October 8 or October 10, but I would like to inquire of the Senator from North Dakota if he thinks that Mr. Kenyon discharged his full duty when he never called the attention of either Colonel Donovan or the Attorney General to the request of the Department of the Interior for an opinion, and does the Senator think Mr. Kenyon is entirely free from blame when he never even looked at the authorities which eventually convinced him that Kem was right?

Mr. NYE. No, Mr. President; I do not think I could so argue, not by any manner of means; but I am not unmindful of the fact that Mr. Kenyon and Mr. Chandler were brought into this case last March and were given a specific duty to perform. When the case came to them, I think I can understand how they felt and why they felt that it was sent to them primarily as a matter of information which they were to mill over.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us take the questions one at a time. Colonel Donovan learned of this matter from a newspaper while he was in the State of New Mexico, some four months after the case went to the department. Does the Senator think that Mr. Kenyon discharged his duty when for four months he did not even mention to Colonel Donovan that the letter addressed to Colonel Donovan asking an opinion had come to his attention?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I could not severely criticize Mr. Kenyon for that.

Mr WALSH of Montana. That was not the question I asked. Kenyon, in the Department of Justice, received a letter addressed to Colonel Donovan requesting an opinion from the Department of the Interior and did not even look at the authority cited and did not call Colonel Donovan's attention to it for four months. I ask the Senator if he thinks that is not subject to reprehension?

Mr. NYE. Yes; I think that is subject to criticism. I believe the unfortunate thing all the way through is the lack of understanding on the part of Kenyon and Chandler as to angles of the question that were quite thoroughly removed from the duties which were directly before them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I like to give credit where credit is due, and I think it is proper to give censure where censure is due; but the Senator from North Dakota apparently does not agree with me about that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NYE. I would prefer not to yield at this point, if the Senator will excuse me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana Very well.

Mr. NYE. On October 10 Mr. Kenyon turned in to Mr. Donovan an opinion which has been praised on every hand as being "as able as it is exhaustive." Mr. Donovan took three days to consider it, this consideration being occasioned by the possibility of action on this ground prejudicing the fraud case which they hoped and expected to bring in connection with the Sinclair contract. However, on or about October 13, satisfied they would not thereby seriously prejudice their fraud case, Mr. Donovan ordered Mr. Kenyon to prepare his opinion in form for the signature of the Attorney General. This redrafted form was ready on the morning of October 15, and it went to the desk of the Attorney General late that afternoon. The Attorney General was then out of the city; but immediately upon his return to his office, on October 16, the following day, the opinion was signed and sent to the Interior Department, the opinion insisting upon cancellation of the renewed contract.

Mr. President, it was not a newspaper nor any member of the committee that brought about the cancellation of this contract. It was almost alone the work of Kenyon and Donovan, undertaken after they had found, in September, the possibility of canceling the contract on the ground that the contract did not conform with the proposal for bids. It was not a matter of five or more months between the time that this specific point was brought to the attention of the Department of Justice and the time when the order of cancellation was issued, but, instead, only four or five weeks.

The Walsh report at least implies that an understanding existed between the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice, which would delay any action looking to cancellation of the contract. In that connection I desire to say that in July an official of the White Eagle Oil Co. came to me in Kansas City voicing the opinion that the Secretary of the Interior had no right to renew the Sinclair contract for the royalty oils in Salt Creek because the Secretary of the Interior had no right, to start with, to grant an option to renew. He cited, as bearing out his contention, a certain court action and was going to write me at my home in Cooperstown, N. Dak.,

setting forth these facts in greater detail. To my knowledge such further information never came, but I kept a memorandum of the matter and since I was planning an early visit to Washington during the summer, I determined that I would then confer with the Department of Justice and Department of Interior with relation to the point. However, I did not come on to Washington until about the 20th of September. I was in the city then for only a few days, but Mr. Kem, attorney for the White Eagle Oil Co., came to see me on one of those days to enlist my interest in the protest of the White Eagle Oil Co. against the renewal. I had wondered if the matter was one to which the committee ought to give its attention or whether it was one to be left entirely with the Department of Justice under the agreement which the committee had had with that department early in the spring with relation to a division of the tasks outlined in the Senate resolution under which we were operating in the study of the Salt Creek matters.

Mr. Kem related that he had voiced the complaint of his company with the Department of Justice, and I assured him that not only would I see the Department of Justice while I was in the city with relation to the matter, but that I wished him to come back on the following day when we could canvass the situation with former Senator Sterling, who was counsel for the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. On the following day we did go over the matter and agreed that the point raised by Mr. Kem was certainly within the realm of the duties of the committee under our resolution, and that if we found the Department of Justice inactive with relation to the question that the committee would certainly want to go into it. On that same day, or the following day, I went personally to the Department of Justice to confer with Mr. Donovan, at which time I was assured of his deep concern with the White Eagle Oil Co. complaint, and I was given every reason then to believe that the department would order done precisely what was ordered done a few weeks later. At about the same time former Senator Sterling, counsel for the committee, had a like conference with Mr. Donovan and he was likewise assured that the department was giving full consideration to the question and would in all probability order the cancellation of the contract.

About the 8th or 10th of October I had occasion to return to Washington, and during the very brief hours that I spent in the city I called again at the Department of Justice and was assured by Mr. Donovan that the report declaring the Sinclair contract subject to cancellation had been prepared by Kenyon and would straightway be placed before the Attorney General for his approval, and that he expected the opinion would be dispatched to the Department of the Interior without delay. In other words, what transpired on October 16, when the Attorney General affixed his signature to the opinion calling for cancellation of the contract, was precisely in keeping with my understanding of what could be expected after visits with Mr. Donovan.

I think it ought to be observed that when this complaint of the White Eagle Oil Co. was brought to my attention I did precisely what Mr. Kem hoped I might do, namely, impress upon the Department of Justice my interest in seeing the matter moved along. Former Senator Sterling made manifest a like interest, but when Mr. Kem, a few days later, approached the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] upon the same matter, and, according to the testimony of Mr. Kem himself, with the same purpose in mind, the Senator, instead of making inquiry of the Department of Justice as to the status of the matter, and making manifest his interest in the action of the Department of Justice, turned to the newspapers. Had he turned to the Department of Justice, as former Senator Sterling and I had done, I am sure he would have received the identical information that we received.

Let it be further noted that if the attitude of the Department of Justice was in any measure a part of a suggested conspiracy of silence, as is certainly implied by the report, then I must, by joining in this report, admit myself in some measure a party to the conspiracy. In part, for that reason, I declined to lend myself to the Walsh report. Likewise have I declined to concur in that report, because I decline to be stampeded into doing a thing which, to my mind, would be a grave injustice to some individuals whose effort and work in connection with cancellation of this contract certainly do not deserve that degree of censure which has been implied by or read into the Walsh report. The work of these individuals deserved better at our hands than is contained within that report.

Mr. President, it is not pleasant to be placed in the position of seeming to in any way or degree defend such departments as existed under Fall and Daugherty, such departments of Government as have, to say the least, occupied extremely suspicious ground in connection with the Teapot Dome scandal and such matters as have had connection with the oil scandals in a general way. It would, as I have already suggested, be much easier to follow now the path of least resistance and stand opposed to nothing which might be said against those departments or men connected with them. But, to my mind, such a course with relation to the report now before us would certainly not reflect any glory upon this body, which ought to desire maintenance of a reputation of fairness such as will merit the confidence of the people in its decisions when they are made and its opinions when they are offered.

The Senate, should it decline to concur in the so-called Walsh report now before it, would be in no sense shielding or whitewashing departments guilty of acts which have been scored and scorned by courts and by decency everywhere. Nor will it by such action necessarily countenance in toto all acts of the department involved in the work accompanying and leading up to the cancellation of the Sinclair royalty oil contract. Instead, by rejecting this report we are but confessing, although there may have been errors, blunders, and, perhaps, a degree of poor judgment during the months that the matter was under consideration by two departments, that nevertheless the eventual result was the cancellation of the Sinclair contract, and that this result was gained without any prodding by the Senate, by any of its committees, by any members of its committees, or by any newspaper, but instead by the study and the work of conscientious attorneys in the office of the Attorney General, whose efforts accomplished a saving to the Government of millions of dollars and whose further effort in connection with their investigations of the royalty oil contract has brought an action in the courts that will in all probability return to the Government many more millions, this time in the form of recovery of profits which the Sinclair interests have taken from the Salt Creek field under the original Fall-Sinclair contract. The effort of these attorneys deserves a vote of appreciation rather than a report which is quite generally accepted as being one which questions their sincerity. Indeed, Mr. President, I wish the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys might be so fortunate as to have the assistance of these same Department of Justice men in its task of prosecuting its investigation into the validity of the leases which underlie the rights now exercised by the Stewart and the Sinclair interests in Salt Creek.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I had expected to speak on this subject this afternoon, but because the hour is now so late I shall not attempt to do so, but shall content myself with simply making the announcement that to-morrow, as soon as I can get the floor in my own right, I shall address the Senate on this question. I may say in that connection, however, that at that time I hope to go into the entire question of the province of the committee that has had the Salt Creek matter under consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Indiana, I ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of this matter be continued until the appropriate hour to-morrow.

Mr. JONES. I shall have to object to any agreement with reference to any other proposition at the present time.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2901) to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, before I speak on the unfinished business I desire to say just a word with reference to the vote on yesterday regarding the bill known as the apportionment bill.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] expressed very clearly my views in regard to that matter. I am in hearty accord with his position. I am heartily in favor of both of these bills, the apportionment bill and the bill now the unfinished business. I hope they will both be acted upon, as I think they should be acted upon, before this session closes. If that measure had come to a vote first, I am not prepared to say now how I should have voted on such a proposition, because, as I say, I am just as much interested in the passage of that bill as I am in the passage of this measure; but as this measure came up first, and the Senate voted that it should be considered, I felt entirely justified in voting against the motion to take up the other bill, however much I was in favor of the passage of that measure.

Now, Mr. President, just a few words with reference to the pending measure.

To my notion, the merits or demerits of prohibition are not involved in the proposition now pending before the Senate. The question involved in this measure is one of enforcement of existing law. I assume that every Member of the Senate, whatever his personal views may be with reference to prohibition, whether he favors it or whether he thinks it is unwise, believes that so long as it is upon the statutes as a law of the country it should be enforced.

The measure that is now pending is a very simple measure. It provides for the enforcement of the constitutional prohibition against the liquor traffic.

The part of the Constitution dealing with this subject reads as follows:

SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

This proposed act provides penalties for the violation of these prohibitions.

Mr. President, we have law fixing penalties for many of these violations, if not all of them. The penalties provided are sufficient for ordinary violations, and probably the most common violations. I want to read what are deemed the principal penalties that are provided in the law as it now exists.

Section 29 of the Volstead Act reads as follows:

Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of this title shall for a first offense be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding six months, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than five years.

Any person violating the provisions of any permit, or who makes any false record, report, or affidavit required by this title, or violates any of the provisions of this title, for which offense a special penalty is not prescribed, shall be fined for a first offense not more than $500; for a second offense not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than 90 days; for any subsequent offense he shall be fined not less than $500 and be imprisoned not less than three months nor more than two years.

Mr. President, this bill simply enlarges the penalties for violations. As I said, the penalties for the ordinary violations of the law are ample now; and the real purpose of this measure is to provide an additional penalty or a larger penalty against those who are convicted of engaging in the violation of the law for commercial purposes. The bill is aimed more specifically against bootlegging and the commercial organizations that we all know have been organized and are being organized throughout the country to make money out of violations of the prohibition law.

I saw in the paper yesterday, I think, a reference to a case that illustrates just what we are seeking to do, and the class of violations that we are seeking to meet. I noticed that in Chicago one of the aldermen, I think, was convicted. He had organized a $5,000,000 company apparently to engage in a systematic violation of the prohibition law, apparently for the specific purpose of commercializing it and making money out of such violations. A penalty of $500 and probably of a few months in jail, or something of that kind, would have no deterrent effect upon anybody desiring to do anything like that.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. In just a moment.

This man was convicted, as I understand, and fined ten or eleven thousand dollars, and sentenced to jail or the penitentiary, I am not sure which, for two years. That is practically no punishment for a man organizing a $5,000,000 company or corporation or association of persons for the deliberate purpose of making money out of violations of the prohibition law; and that is really the character of the cases that it is especially desired to meet by this legislation.

I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I wanted to inquire of the Senator was this:

I recognize the heinousness of such an offense as that just described by the Senator. I should be perfectly willing to penalize that kind of offense exactly as the Senator has, or even more severely; but is there any way by which we can differentiate in this act so that a particular judge in whom we may not have any confidence at all—and in some of them I have not the slightest confidence—will not be able to utilize the extraordinary penalties that are fixed as the maximum by this law in order to curry favor with some particular people or some particular set of individuals? Can the Senator suggest any way by which there can be a segregation or a particularization in the law under which the extraordinary penalties, the highest that he may see fit to inflict, may be inflicted upon those whom he thus describes, and leave the other penalties so that a judge may not have the opportunity to utilize the highest penalties against very petty offenders and offenders that are of little or no consequence?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I appreciate the situation to which the Senator has referred. He is an experienced lawyer. I do not know that we could frame this statute in a way that would protect everybody from any injustice that might be done by a judge. I can not believe that there is any Federal judge who is going to take advantage of his position to impose sentences of this kind in trivial cases. I have never heard of anything of that kind. I know that it is possible under the terms of this bill; that is true; and if proper safeguards against such a thing could be put into a statute, I should be perfectly willing that they be put in. It does seem to me, however, that in all criminal statutes we have to rely very largely upon the justice and high character of the judge. There may be, of course, exceptions.

Mr. JOHNSON. Generally speaking, the Senator from Washington is entirely correct. In this peculiar kind of offense I regret to say that I do not believe he is always correct. I am unable myself to see how a statute could be worded so as to apply to different classes of offenses such as I have indicated; but I thought possibly the Senator, with his wider knowledge of the subject, might be able to suggest something in that regard.

Mr. JONES. I am satisfied that I have not wider knowledge of that phase of the matter than the Senator from California.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Does the Senator expect to get a vote on this bill to-day? I am asking because there are several of us who want to have a meeting.

Mr. JONES. I really see no prospect of a vote to-day.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If a vote is not going to be taken to-day, I am going to try to have that meeting.

Mr. JONES. I think the Senator can safely hold the meeting.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well.

Mr. JONES. I have understood from several Senators that they do not desire to vote to-day, but they want to discuss the measure and get along with it, so that we hope for a vote to-morrow.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate what the Senator has just said, and I, too, am more or less in accord with what he has said; but I should like to point out the thought which I know has occurred to him, that in many of the States already very drastic State laws have been passed; and, to show the Senator the miscarriage of justice as a result of the conflict of the two sets of law, while the man in Chicago who had organized the $5,000,000 criminal ring received a sentence of only two years in the penitentiary, a woman in Detroit who was an individual bootlegger, and had been arrested on three occasions for bootlegging a mere pint of liquor, under the laws of Michigan was sent to the penitentiary for life. It does seem to me that when we pass these laws we should take into consideration the existing State laws, so that injustice will not be compounded, but rather reduced.

Mr. JONES. I am not going to enter into a discussion of the State laws or the laws of the State of Michigan. The United States has a jurisdiction within which it can act and within which I think it should act.

Of course, we should get this legislation as proper as it can possibly be made, but it does seem to me that we have to assume—I think we have a right to assume—that the Federal judges will act wisely and justly in these matters. If I have had any complaint to make with reference to Federal judges in regard to violations of the prohibition laws which we now have on the statute books, it is that they have been too lenient rather than enforcing too severely the laws that they have the right to enforce.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I would like also to observe, in connection with the point I have just brought up, that under the Constitution, which the Senator has just quoted, Congress has provided that the States shall have concurrent authority to carry out the provisions of the statute. Congress having said that, it would be not only unfair but without the spirit of the Constitution not to take into consideration the State laws which now exist, because we have to some extent asked the States to help us to enforce this law, and in passing a Federal law we should not ask them to do that and then pass a Federal law without regard to what they have done. It seems to me we would be shortsighted and compounding injustices rather than eliminating them.

Mr. JONES. There are some of the States that are not cooperating very much with the Federal Government in the enforcement of a provision in the Constitution which, in my judgment, is just as binding upon the States and as obligatory upon the citizens of the States as upon the Federal Government and upon the citizens of the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I was going to ask the Senator this question: When this bill came from the House——

Mr. JONES. This bill did not come from the House. This is a Senate bill.

Mr. COPELAND. When it went to the committee there was no limitation of the measure to criminal prosecutions, was there?

Mr. JONES. Of course, it was intended to apply only to criminal prosecutions, but the committee has suggested an amendment which I think is entirely proper.

Mr. COPELAND. I would like to ask this question: Suppose a young college student were found with whisky in his possession. That would be a violation of the law, would it not?

Mr. JONES. I think so. I am not entirely familiar with all the provisions of the Volstead Act.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, if in a doctor's office there were found whisky, and no record of his having obtained it in the technical manner prescribed, that would be illegal possession?

Mr. JONES. I do not understand that that is, under the Volstead Act. I do not think so.

Mr. COPELAND. Let us assume for the moment that it is.

Mr. JONES. Well, assume that it is.

Mr. COPELAND. In these instances that I have cited, of the young college student and the doctor having illegal possession of liquor, would that young man or the doctor be sent to jail for five years or fined $10,000?

Mr. JONES. I suppose if the judge so wished, it could be done, but a judge like that would not stay on the bench very long.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not so sure of that.

Mr. JONES. I am pretty sure of that. I will confess that all sorts of suppositions can be made that technically might endanger a person to a far greater penalty than, of course, he should receive, but I can not conceive of courts and judges acting in such a way.

Mr. COPELAND. Is not the question raised by the Senator from California a pertinent one?

Mr. JONES. Certainly; and I have tried to answer it in the best way I can. The Senator from New York and the Senator from California are just as capable of coming to a conclusion regarding that as I am.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume it is the purpose of this debate to attempt to formulate a law which will reach those vile persons who are flooding the country with poisoned liquor. It should be possible to formulate a law which would strike them with the greatest possible severity, and I am in favor of that——

Mr. JONES. Yes; I have no doubt of that.

Mr. COPELAND. Yet we have to think about these young men who are misled, misdirected often, and when I think about some doctors who may have liquor in their possession which did not get there in a manner which is not perfectly legitimate, as I see it, there should be provision to protect such persons—innocent-minded persons, entirely different from the criminal type spoken of by the Senator from Washington; there should be written into the bill, if possible, a distinction between those types of persons in order that there may be no injustice done and no miscarriage of justice from overexactions.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think it is very difficult for us to define fully and minutely in a statute how far a court may go or how far not or what shall be the particular details with reference to a violation of law. It seems to me we must rely, to some extent, at any rate, upon the humanity and the justice and the proper conduct of the judge. While I can conceive, as the Senator has, that it may be possible that some student may intentionally violate the law, and yet in a very minor way; and he might be brought before some court, which possibly might impose the extreme penalty; yet I can not believe that anything of that sort would be done.

Mr. COPELAND. Yet the Senator recognizes that if the judge did not have the right spirit, the penalty might be imposed upon persons of the type suggested?

Mr. JONES. That is a supposition which may be assumed with reference to every criminal act that can possibly be passed.

Mr. COPELAND. Does not the Senator think, in view of the failure to formulate reasonable legislation in the past, that we ought to be extremely careful in the future in prescribing penalties and making changes in the law?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think we have passed pretty reasonable laws in the past touching all sorts of criminal acts, and there are very few abuses on the part of the judges. I do not look for any abuses of this statute on the part of our Federal judges.

Mr. WHEELER. May I inquire from the Senator just why it is that he wants to increase the penalty? It would seem to me that it is unnecessary to increase the penalties unless there is some very good reason for doing so.

Mr. JONES. I tried to state to the Senate that it has become the conclusion of the enforcement officials that the penalties now provided by law are not sufficient to deter men from violating the law, from considerations purely commercial, and that includes smuggling. I will be glad to read what was stated by the Department of Justice, which really gives the justification for the legislation. I would like to read it.

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to say to the Senator that I do not think the trouble at the present time is with the penalties imposed in most instances, but I think the trouble is in the laxity of the men in the field, or it is because of the fact that there are not enough men in the field to enforce the law; and I am not seeking to criticize the department, because I know the assistant commissioner and the commissioner, who both worked under me in Montana when I was United States district attorney, and I feel that both of them are very competent men.

Mr. JONES. I will read from the report the statement of Mrs. Willebrandt, who, as the Senator knows, has had charge directly of prohibition enforcement in the United States. Whatever anyone may think about Mrs. Willebrandt, I myself have no doubt as to her ability and her earnestness in the enforcement of the law, and also her desire that justice may be done, as well as that adequate penalties may be inflicted for violations of the law of the land. In testifying before the Judiciary Committee she said:

> I most earnestly recommend the passage of Senate bill 2901. It raises the maximum penalty which may, within the discretion of the judge, be imposed for a violation of those parts of the national prohibition act which tie in with the things prohibited by the Constitution of the United States—the eighteenth amendment. * * * I have become convinced, not only by my own experience but by the recommendations of scores of Federal judges and hundreds of Department of Justice law-enforcement officials, such as United States attorneys, marshals, and the like, that the maximum penalties of the Volstead Act for the violation of things which violate the Constitution as well as substantive law, are entirely inadequate. As a result of the inadequacy of the penalty which the Volstead Act provides for the things the Constitution prohibits, prosecutors have been led to resort to prosecutions under other laws than the Volstead Act whenever they could.
> They have resorted to the old internal revenue laws relating to the violation or evasion of various kinds of liquor taxes and the Supreme Court of the United States has upheld the use of those old internal revenue laws. However, it is only the occasional case that has evidence so prepared that in honesty a prosecution can be grounded under the internal revenue laws rather than the Volstead Act.
> The other statute that they have popularly resorted to for grave, serious, widespread violations of the liquor laws, instead of grounding the offense under the national prohibition act, is the conspiracy statute, section 37 of the Penal Code. In my estimation, section 37 has been strained beyond all reach in grounding liquor-law prosecutions under it * * *.

Mr. President, that is the statement of the officer of the Government who had had charge to a great extent, if not entirely, of prosecutions for violations of this law.

Mr. WHEELER. What is the maximum now? I do not remember offhand.

Mr. JONES. Here is the law:

> Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of this title shall for a first offense be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding six months, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than five years.
> Any person violating the provisions of any permit, or who makes any false record, report, or affidavit required by this title, or violates any of the provisions of this title, for which offense a special penalty is not prescribed, shall be fined for a first offense not more than $500; for a second offense not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than 90 days; for any subsequent offense he shall be fined not less than $500 and be imprisoned not less than three months nor more than two years * * *.

Mrs. Willebrandt bases her recommendation for the passage of this act upon her experience as the head of the law-enforcement department of the Government, and that is based upon the experiences and the recommendations of judges, marshals, and United States attorneys, and others who have been brought into direct contact with the matter. It seems to me that that is an experience and a knowledge derived from sources which are thoroughly reliable.

This bill has been approved by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, composed of very able lawyers. A similar bill was reported in another body by the Judiciary Committee of that body, composed of very able lawyers. Their judgment is far better than mine. It confirms my opinion and my judgment, and I think we can very safely rely upon their judgment.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to say to the Senator that I feel that we should not leave the minimum as it is at present. I have in mind, for instance, at the present time, one State where people are brought up, convicted, and the judges are constantly letting them off with a dollar fine, with practically no punishment whatever. Instead of extending the maximum to five years, which I think we ought to be careful about, and making it so that any judge in this country can impose imprisonment for five years upon some individual who violates the Volstead Act, I think we ought to increase the minimum, but that we should not increase the maximum penalty under this statute.

Mr. JONES. We have our differences of opinion with reference to that matter, and those differences must be harmonized in some way The Department of Justice itself has felt that this is the wise way to proceed. I know there are many States in the Union which have a maximum penalty of five years for violations no different from those covered by the pending bill, except, as I said, that the real purpose of the bill is to provide for more adequate penalties that may be inflicted upon those who violate the prohibition law largely for commercial purposes.

That, Mr. President, is all I care to say.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator before he takes his seat if the Department of Justice or if the Senator himself has taken into consideration the fact that by reason of penalties being too severe very often guilty men have been acquitted by juries?

Mr. JONES. That has been taken into consideration. I think that emphasizes the fact that under the bill it will be possible to prosecute the minor offenders who have been referred to; because if any complaint should be made against a minor offender, the jury would be able to acquit. But in cases such as we have had in Chicago—and we have had similar cases out in the State of Washington—the juries would not hesitate to convict if the penalty was much larger than it is now.

Mr. BLEASE. I know in my own experience that we have had jurors in more cases than one, when they came out of the jury room after having acquitted a man, make the statement that if they could have convicted him and been assured from some source that the penalty would not be very severe, they would have convicted him, but they refused to convict the defendant because of the severe penalties that might be inflicted. For instance, in my own State in the case of manslaughter I have had several jurors tell me that they would have convicted the defendant for manslaughter, were they permitted to find a verdict of manslaughter, if they could have inflicted some different punishment, but that because under the statute the sentence could not be less than two years and because they did not propose to put the particular defendant in the penitentiary or chain gang for two years, they acquitted him. If they had been allowed to inflict a lesser punishment, they would have convicted the defendant.

Mr. JONES. The provisions of the bill are not applicable to cases like that, because the minimum is the very lowest possible. There is no limit to the minimum, and the jurors would take that into account.

Mr. BLEASE. Then, if we take that view of it we should change the title of the bill and make it read: "A bill to license rich men and to put poor men in jail." I happen to know of cases where the same judge tried two men. One of them had influential friends who would go to the judge's room after court adjourned and use their influence with the judge to be easy on the particular defendant because his father was a good man or his mother was a widow or for some other reason. The next morning the other poor devil who had no one to speak for him just drifted in without any friends. Not long ago I heard two defendants sentenced for stealing automobiles. One young man had influence behind him and was given six months for stealing a Cadillac. The same judge on the same day sentenced another boy, who had no one to speak for him, to five years in the penitentiary for stealing a Ford. That was an actual experience and that is what is going to happen under this bill if the Senator from Washington does not provide some safeguard against it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I am sorry that I have a committee meeting at the present time which I must attend, and I desire therefore to speak only a very few minutes. I should like to proceed without being interrupted. I shall promise to take not more than 10 minutes. I merely want to state the reasons why I feel that I shall have to vote against the bill in its present form.

In the first place, the bill changes existing law so that a first offender may be fined $10,000 and imprisoned for five years. That I believe to be contrary to the principles of justice which we have usually followed.

In the second place, a study of English history shows that our ancestors at one time in an effort to secure observance of law provided very heavy penalties. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries there was an enormous amount of law breaking in England. In order to try to stop that wave of crime capital punishment was made the penalty for about 200 different crimes, including things which seem to us at the present time as utterly lacking in any justification for such a terrible punishment, namely, poaching, or the shooting of a rabbit on some nobleman's preserves. The taking of a loaf of bread from a bake shop, and similar offenses could be punished by loss of life. English jurisprudence found that it was impossible to prevent crime in that way and that it was impossible to secure convictions under laws of that kind.

The experience of our race has been that when we apply too drastic punishment for crimes which are not universally recognized as heinous offenses, such as murder, rape, attacks with intent to kill, and matters of that kind which have been crimes since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, and whenever we attempt to punish crimes other than those by excessive penalties we do not succeed in achieving our object. Consequently, to change the law at the present time and make it possible for an ardent judge, acting under the pressure of public opinion, to impose a fine of $10,000 and imprisonment for five years in the penitentiary for the first offense is in my opinion not likely to produce the effect desired by the proponents of the measure.

In the third place, we have at the present time certain States, as has been pointed out, where the penalties are exceedingly drastic. I have read in the newspapers, and I have not seen it contradicted, that, for instance, in the State of Michigan for the fourth offense of having in one's possession any illicit liquor, one may be imprisoned for life. Surely nothing in our day and generation would be tolerated any more severe than that. Yet I do not find any evidence whatever that there is more observance of law in Michigan than in any neighboring State; in fact, some of the States where the law is very much more lenient than that have a better record for observance of the law than exists in the States where the penalty is very, very severe.

Only yesterday I heard of a case in a college town in Michigan—I need not mention any names—where at a recent dance participated in by the college fraternities the reports disclosed the existence of a very large amount of liquor being used in an extremely intemperate manner. In other words, enabling a judge to inflict a very severe penalty has not resulted in that State, or in any others similarly located, in increasing observance of law.

Finally, and in the fourth place, we are about to inaugurate as President of the United States a gentleman who has announced that as a part of his program he will appoint a commission to study the situation with regard to the eighteenth amendment and its enforcement. Mr. Hoover has expressed repeatedly his belief that a commission ought to study the situation now existing in the country, which everyone agrees is very bad, and make proper recommendations for its improvement. I believe that Mr. Hoover will appoint a commission consisting of eminent citizens who are not associated with either those who are banded together against the eighteenth amendment or those who are banded together particularly to secure its enforcement, but will secure the services of citizens whose whole effort will be to see to it that we have more law observance in the country and less crime, and to bring our country more nearly into line with the countries which worship law and order. After that commission has met and made its findings and its report if it recommends the enactment of such provisions as are contained in this particular bill I shall believe that I am wrong and shall be willing to vote for such a measure; but until that commission does so recommend it does not seem to me that this a wise thing to do.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has referred to a case which clearly comes under the conspiracy laws of the country. Where a number of people conspire together on a large scale to break our laws, it is possible to secure an indictment and, if they are convicted, to inflict very severe penalties.

For these reasons I shall vote against the bill. Before taking my seat I should like to place in the RECORD a few references to the Criminal Code of the United States to show what is the nature of the crimes for which this and similar punishments are to-day regarded.

I find in the Criminal Code, section 82, that for the crime of shanghaiing sailors—that is, for forcibly taking on board a vessel engaged in trade and commerce sailors who do not desire to serve, practically kidnaping them and imprisoning them on vessels and forcing them to perform labor when they have not committed any crime, but merely in order to force them to serve on vessels engaged in long voyages and practically to kidnap them—the penalty at the present time is a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both. And yet we do not find that the crime of shanghaiing is a very common crime even though the penalty is so moderate as that.

Section 135 of the Criminal Code in regard to attempting to influence witnesses, jurors, or officers provides that whoever corruptly or by threat or force or by any threatening letter or communication shall endeavor to influence or intimidate any witness in any court, and so forth, or obstruct the due administration of justice, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year. That is considered an adequate punishment to prevent that crime which interferes with the progress of the wheels of justice.

With regard to more serious crimes, surely everyone will agree that the white-slave traffic is one of the most serious crimes which may be carried on in this or any other country. Under section 398, title 18, of the code of the United States, we find a penalty provided for "any person who shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported, or aid or assist in obtaining transportation for," and so forth, "any woman for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery or for any other immoral purpose," may be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years. In other words, a similar penalty is to be imposed by the pending bill for a violation of the prohibition law.

It seems as though sometimes those who are deeply engaged in devoting their lives to this one crime on the calendar, the violation of the Volstead Act, had lost their sense of proportion and their sense of values.

Another crime which has a similar punishment is found in title 18 of the Criminal Code of the United States, section 426:

> Hovering on coast with slaves on board: Whoever, being the captain, master, or commander of any vessel found in any river, port, bay, harbor, or on the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the United States, or hovering on the coast thereof, having on board any person, for the purpose of selling such person as a slave, or with intent to land such person for any such purpose, shall be fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than four years.

That is not as severe a penalty, Mr. President, as that proposed and made possible for the first offenders in the bill now before us.

Mr. BORAH. What is the date of the statute the Senator is reading?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am reading from title 18 of the Criminal Code which we finally approved and adopted here two years ago.

There is also a reference to kidnaping and bringing kidnaped persons into the United States, as follows:

> Whoever shall knowingly and willfully bring into the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof any person inveigled or forcibly kidnaped in any other country, with intent to hold such person so inveigled or kidnaped in confinement or to any involuntary servitude; or whoever shall knowingly and willfully sell or cause to be sold into any condition of involuntary servitude any other person for any term whatever; or whoever shall knowingly and willfully hold to involuntary servitude any person so brought or sold, shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than five years.

There again, Mr. President, we find a penalty less than that provided in this bill. It seems to me that in our zeal we are asked to do something which, in the first place, will not be effective, as history shows severe penalties do not insure a reign of law; and, in the second place, will cause and make it possible for our judges to inflict a greater penalty for this particular offense, which in itself has not been considered morally wrong, although at present it is legally wrong in the United States, than is imposed on persons who are engaged in slavery, kidnaping, and the white-slave traffic.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield that I may ask the Senator from Washington a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. I do not desire to discuss the bill for the moment. I merely wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what his intention is as to the time for reaching a vote. Is it his intention to have the bill carried over until to-morrow and to recess when we shall conclude the session to-day?

Mr. JONES. I desire that the Senate shall take a recess to-night, and I have a unanimous-consent agreement prepared which I intend to submit.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I shall occupy but a few minutes.

Mr. JONES. I will submit a proposed unanimous-consent agreement before we close to-day's session.

Mr. EDGE. In other words, the Senator does not expect to reach a vote on the bill to-day?

Mr. JONES. I do not think there is any probability of reaching a vote to-day.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the pending bill involves a subject of great importance. Additional legislation on this subject is being demanded by a great many people, but we must be very careful in what we do. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] has made a suggestion that is worthy of our consideration. If penalties for first offenses shall be made too severe there will be difficulty in getting convictions. If there is put up to a judge or jury a situation where they must in effect—for that is what it is—permit the law to be violated, rather than impose what they believe to be an unjust punishment on some person who has been inveigled into the violation of the law, we shall have done harm rather than good.

What we need, Mr. President, is strict law enforcement under officers who are honest; who can not be bribed. There ought not to be employed unscrupulous and unprincipled detectives who can be used to "frame" somebody in order to let some one else in more favorable circumstances financially escape. I think perhaps the most contemptible person in the world is the detective who will shield the guilty party—the culprit—and unload the crime on some innocent and uninfluential man or woman. We have heard of that being done. We had an instance in this city when the Sinclair trial was on where a detective and his force undertook to hamper the instrumentalities of the court and defeat the ends of justice. They were seeking to acquit a man, Mr. Sinclair, charged with a grave offense against his country.

The detectives to whom I refer are W. J. Burns and his son. They were convicted of shadowing a jury, of interfering with the court's procedure when Sinclair, the rich oil man, was on trial for a serious criminal offense. Their purpose was to defeat the ends of justice and prevent the conviction of Sinclair.

Sinclair was a criminal in the eyes of the American people; he is a criminal to-day. He has escaped punishment only because of his enormous wealth; because he is a millionaire. Just recently I read an article in the Washington Star. Here it is. It reads in part as follows:

> Besides Sinclair, who was sentenced to serve six months, H. Mason Day, an associate, and William J. Burns and his son, W. Sherman Burns, also asked the court to set aside their convictions by the District Supreme Court for contempt in connection with the shadowing. Day was given 4 months in jail, the elder Burns 15 days, and W. Sherman Burns was fined $1,000.

And they go under the name of American detectives—think of it—employed to do questionable and crooked things to shield a criminal.

Mr. President, I think there are many honorable detectives, and in my opinion they are engaged in a splendid work when they are hunting down those who have violated the law and are seeking to collect truthful testimony in order to bring about the conviction of such persons; but think of a detective crippling and hindering a court, shielding the guilty person, and following around after a jury for the purpose of breaking up the processes of the court and bringing about the acquittal of a guilty man!

This is not the first time the Burns Detective Agency has been in bad repute. The late Senator Watson, of Georgia, now gone to his reward, had a very ugly story which he told about this same detective Burns. Senator Watson said that Burns was employed to go down into Georgia to help secure the acquittal of Leo Frank, who had been convicted of criminal assault and murder, and who was afterwards lynched by some citizens of Georgia. Burns sought to put that crime upon an innocent Alabama negro. The story was that a white girl was murdered in Leo Frank's manufacturing establishment. Frank was accused of the crime. The detective force of Mr. Burns—and he himself went down there—undertook to saddle the crime upon a little negro, a janitor, who was found in the manufacturing establishment, I believe, the night after the girl had been murdered. The negro was sitting near the furnace, with the door of the building wide open, sound asleep. He was the boy on whom the Burns detectives were going to unload the crime.

The girl was dead upstairs, and this negro did not even know it. Every Senator from the South who hears me knows that it would have been impossible to have kept that negro anywhere about that building if he had committed that murder; and certainly he would not have gone asleep there all alone if he had known there was some dead person upstairs. I wrote Senator Watson that the fact that the negro boy was found sound asleep sitting by the door was proof of his innocence.

Senator Watson excoriated this same Burns detective for trying to shield the guilty person and convict an innocent negro boy. The negro commits enough crimes on his own account to be punished for, including the very offense with which Leo Frank was charged, and the negro pays the penalty, and ought to pay it; but any white man who will undertake to saddle such a crime on an innocent negro is a criminal himself. The people of Georgia were so outraged at detective Burns's performance that a mob got after him and he fled for his life from that State. Yet he is the man who was here working in Mr. Sinclair's cause, hounding a jury in the city of Washington, hampering and hindering a court of justice, and helping to shield Sinclair and to ease him out of a grave crime against his country. Let the judgment against the Burns detective stand.

Mr. President, I hope that those charged with and interested in the enforcement of the prohibition law will get honest detectives who will not "frame" people, but who will diligently go about their business of convicting those who are purposely and intentionally violating the law.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I submit a proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed agreement will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That after the hour of 3 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of February 16, 1929, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 15 minutes upon the pending bill, viz, S. 2901, to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented; nor more than once nor longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment proposed thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Does that provide for a limitation of debate on to-morrow?

Mr. JONES. It does.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, under the rules is it not necessary that the roll shall be called for a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The agreement does not provide for a final vote.

Mr. JONES. The agreement does not fix a time to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the agreement submitted by the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if no Senator at this time desires to speak on the bill, in view of the agreement, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

WASHINGTON (D. C.) AIRPORT

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. JONES. I withhold it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There is a minor matter upon which I should like to have the Senate act and which will take but a moment. I should like to call up Senate Joint Resolution 216, to provide a joint committee of the House and Senate to consider the Washington airport problem. The joint resolution was reported from the District Committee this morning. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 216) to establish a joint commission on airports, which was read, as follows:

Whereas it is vital to the resources of the Capital of the United States that its airport facilities should be adequate for present and anticipated aviation needs in order that Washington's equipment in this respect should serve maximum capital requirements and reflect the Capital's national leadership; and

Whereas this important problem involves not only municipal facilities but also Federal facilities and a proper consideration of the relationships between them; and

Whereas comprehensive inquiry and recommendation require simultaneous study of such ports and fields as may be maintained for the use and benefit of the War Department, the Navy Department, the Post Office Department, the Commerce Department, and the municipality; and

Whereas this multilateral problem involves considerations ordinarily referred to several separate committees in the Senate and the House of Representatives: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a joint congressional commission to be known as the joint commission on airports and to be composed of five Senators, appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members elect of the House of Representatives for the Seventy-first Congress, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The commission is authorized and directed to investigate the needs for airports and aviation fields of the War Department, the Navy Department, the Post Office Department, the Department of Commerce, and the District of Columbia, and to report to the Congress as soon as practicable but in no event later than December 15, 1929, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations of sites, plans, and suitable allocation of costs.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the commission, or any committee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services in reporting hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the commission, which shall not exceed $2,000, shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the commission.

SEC. 3. The commission shall cease to exist upon the submission of its report to the Congress in accordance with the provisions of this resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I renew the motion made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, February 16, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, February 15, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most Holy and Merciful Father, manifest in us finer works than are even seen in the heavens above and in the earth beneath. So, we pray, make us unafraid in affliction and fearless in the gardens of life, where the thorns grow. Oh, wherever we are, whatsoever may be the circumstances confronting us, may we sing the jubilee of the soul, which is the music of a sweet and beautiful trust in the All-Father! We bless Thee that Thy boundless strength is our infinite tenderness. In Thee each succeeding day may our characters have their trend and our destinies their verdict. Heavenly Guide, keep us on the road of the loving heart, singing not sobbing, blessing not blighting, and thus we shall serve Thee well and wide just from where we are. In the name of the world's Saviour we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 110) entitled "Joint resolution to provide for accepting, ratifying, and confirming the cessions of certain islands of the Samoan group to the United States, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the reports of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 8736. An act to provide for the inspection of the battle field of Brices Cross Roads, Miss., and the battle field of Tupelo, or Harrisburg, Miss.;

H. R. 11469. An act to authorize appropriations for construction at the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y.;

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. NYE and Mr. PITTMAN members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of the Interior.

PROVISIONAL MISSOURI MILITIA

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 379, extending the benefits of the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 1, 1920, the act of Congress approved July 3, 1926, and the act of Congress approved May 23, 1928, to the Missouri Militia who served during the Civil War.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 379, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 1, 1920, the act of Congress approved July 3, 1926, and the act of Congress approved May 23, 1928, be, and they are hereby, extended to include the officers and privates of the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia who served 90 days or more during the Civil War and were honorably discharged, and to the widows and minor children of such persons.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know whether this is a privileged matter or not. I think we should have some explanation of the resolution, because it seems to be quite comprehensive.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. I will read the last part of the report.

There is but a handful of the survivors of these regiments and their dependents on the pension roll at the present time and a high percentage of them are blind or otherwise incapacitated and there appears to be no just reason why the benefits of the acts as provided in this resolution should not be extended to them. It was brought out in the hearing this committee had on this resolution that the additional annual cost would be a minmum of $2,000 and a maximum of $5,000 and a conservative estimate would be about $3,000 additional per annum.

Mr. SNELL. Just who are these people and were they in Federal service or not?

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. They were. I will ask my colleague from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] to make the explanation desired by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York, of course, understands that our pension laws consist of a succession of acts and, in many of these acts, reference is made to the provisions and descriptive paragraphs of previous acts. During the Civil War period, under direction of the Federal Government, numerous military organizations were created from time to time in Missouri, to meet emergency conditions. One of these was the Missouri Enrolled Militia, the members of which have never been given a pensionable status under our general pension laws, and the pending resolution does not confer upon them a pensionable status. In February, 1863, a number of regiments were formed from men selected from the Enrolled Missouri Militia. These new units were known as the Provisional Missouri Militia, or Provisional Enrolled Missouri Militia, and were utilized for continuous service during the then existing emergency.

These military units, while in the service of the State of Missouri, cooperated with the Federal forces, rendering effective service, and the Federal Government furnished uniforms and equipment for these soldiers, and afterwards reimbursed the State of Missouri for all money expended for their services, thereby, in effect, recognizing these organizations as constituent parts of the Federal forces, though these Missouri Militia regiments were never formally mustered into the Regular United States Army and were not commanded by the regular United States Army officers. Inasmuch as these military units were never mustered into the United States Army, and technically were never a part of, although actively cooperating with, the Federal military forces, service in these regiments did not give a soldier a pensionable status under act pensioning persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War, and for the same reason widows of these soldiers did not originally have a pensionable status under an act which by its terms limits its benefits to widows or former widows of officers or enlisted men in the military or naval service of the United States.

But in recognition of the real service performed by these Missouri military organizations, by the act of March 3, 1873 (R. S., sec. 4722; Code of Laws of the United States, title 38, chap. 2, sec. 23), Congress extended the provisions of the general pension laws to officers and privates of the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia who were disabled by reason of injuries received or disease contracted in the line of duty, while such militia was cooperating with the United States forces, and to the widows and children of any such person dying of injury received or disease contracted in service in line of duty.

It will be observed that the act of March 3, 1873, did not provide pensions for service alone, but for disabilities incurred in line of duty. But for disabilities thus contracted this act placed members of the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia in the same class and on the same basis as those who had served in the Regular Army during the Civil War period. Many members of the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia were pensioned under the act of March 3, 1873.

Prior to June 27, 1890, all pensions were based, not on service but on disabilities resulting from or contracted in the service, but the act of June 27, 1890, subject to certain limitations, conferred a pensionable status on all persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War, who were honorably discharged, and so forth, and on the widows and minor children of such persons. In administering this law the Pension Bureau ruled that the provisions of the act of June 27, 1890, were not sufficiently broad to extend the benefits of that act to the officers and enlisted men who served in the Missouri State Militia or the Provisional Missouri Militia, and in order to correct this manifest injustice and extend its provisions to this group of soldiers, Congress passed a joint resolution known as the act of February 15, 1895, which was as follows:

> That the provisions of the act of June 27, 1890, be, and are hereby, extended to include the officers and privates of the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia who served 90 days during the late War of the Rebellion, and were honorably discharged, and to the widows and minor children of such persons. The provisions of this act shall include all such persons now on the pension rolls, or who may hereafter apply to be admitted thereto.

On the adoption of this resolution the officers and enlisted men of the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia were given the benefits of the liberal act of June 27, 1890, and their widows and minor children were placed on the same footing as the widows and minor children of soldiers who served in the United States Army during the Civil War.

The act of February 6, 1907, relates to survivors of the Civil War and, like the act of June 27, 1890, did not extend its benefits to soldiers who served in the Missouri State Militia or the Provisional Missouri Militia, but it was an act solely beneficial to soldiers who had served 90 days or more in the regular military or naval service of the United States. To enlarge the beneficiaries of the act of February 6, 1907, and bring the members of the Missouri State Militia and Provisional Missouri Militia under its provisions and benefits, Congress passed another joint resolution known as the act of March 4, 1907, extending the benefits of the act of February 6, 1907, to all classes included in the act of February 15, 1895, among which were members of the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia, and their widows and minor children.

The act of April 19, 1908, dealt with widows' pensions, increasing the rate from $8 to $12 per month. This increase accrued to all widows already pensioned or who might be thereafter pensioned under existing laws. Then came the act of May 11, 1912, which described its beneficiaries in substantially the same language used in the act of June 27, 1890, which was followed by a paragraph extending its benefits to all persons embraced within the provisions of the act of February 15, 1895, which, of course, included officers and enlisted men who had served in the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia.

The acts of May 1, 1920, July 3, 1926, and May 23, 1928, granted pensions to "every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, who was honorably discharged therefrom," and so forth, and to the widows and minor children of such persons. It is evident that these descriptive words defining the class of soldiers entitled to pensions were not sufficiently broad to include soldiers who served in either the Missouri State Militia or the Provisional Missouri Militia, because, as I have already shown, these organizations were not technically mustered into the military service of the United States, although they were organized under an agreement between the State of Missouri and the Federal Government, cooperated with the Union forces and rendered very valuable service to the Federal Government. By the terms of these acts the beneficiaries of governmental bounty in the form of pensions were substantially restricted because certain classes of persons entitled to pensions under previous acts were not embraced in the description of the classes entitled to pensions under these three acts. So the provisions of these three acts were not extended to those who served in the Missouri State Militia or the Provisional Missouri Militia and their widows and minor children, although these classes had a pensionable status under prior acts.

In construing the act of May 1, 1920, the department held (Lewis, case 21, Pension Decisions 200) that the act of May 1, 1920, does not provide a pensionable status for widows of members of the provisional regiments of Enrolled Missouri Militia, and that the act of May 1, 1920, does not confer a pensionable status on the widow of any person on account of his services during the Civil War unless rendered as an officer or enlisted man in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States.

It will be observed that when the act of May 1, 1920, was passed the benefits of all previous Civil War pension acts had been extended to the soldiers who served 90 days or more in the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia, provided they had been honorably discharged, and to their widows and dependent children; but the provisions of the acts of May 1, 1920, July 3, 1926, and May 23, 1928, did not extend, and by subsequent act have not as yet been extended to include the soldiers who served in these two Missouri militia organizations and their widows and minor children.

I am convinced that in passing these last three acts Congress had no intention of excluding from their benefits soldiers and widows who had for many years been placed by law on an equality with those specifically described in these three acts, and who had under prior acts been recipients of the Nation's bounty in the form of pensions on an absolute equality with those included in the classes specifically enumerated in the three aforesaid acts. In view of the long-established public policy of pensioning those who served in these military units and their dependents we are justified in assuming that the omission of this class from these acts was by inadvertence. On several former occasions when a similar omission had been made in pension acts it was promptly corrected by joint resolution of Congress, and inasmuch as the adoption of the pending resolution will not add to the pension rolls a new class of beneficiaries who have not heretofore enjoyed a pensionable status, justice and sound public policy justify, and I think demand, the adoption of the pending resolution, the main purpose of which is to correct a manifest injustice and to equalize the pensions of persons belonging to the same class who are not now on the same footing, and which inequality results from some having been pensioned under one act and others under a different act.

Practically all the soldiers who served in the Provisional Missouri Militia and the Missouri State Militia, who are now living, are drawing pensions, and nearly all of the widows of these soldiers are now already on the pension rolls, but some of them are not drawing as much as others, although belonging to the same class. Some are pensioned under one law and others acquired their pensionable status under another act. Those pensioned under one law are getting $30 per month and others belonging to the same class and of the same age, who were pensioned at a different time and under a different act, are getting $40 per month.

Before May 23, 1928, all widows of Civil War veterans who were drawing pensions received the same amount, $30 per month. This included the widows of soldiers who served in the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia. That is to say, prior to the act of May 23, 1928, there was no discrimination against widows of soldiers who served in the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia. The act of May 23, 1928, was passed in response to a nation-wide demand for an increase in the pensions of widows of Civil War veterans. This act attempted to increase the pension allowance of all widows of Civil War veterans from $30 to $40 per month, but in drawing the bill the benefits of its provisions were limited to widows of persons who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War for 90 days or more, and who had married their soldier husbands prior to June 27, 1905, and who had then attained or may hereafter attain the age of 75 years, and who were pensioned under the general pension laws. It is apparent that this act was not sufficiently broad and comprehensive to include soldiers who served in the Missouri State Militia or Provisional Missouri Militia or their widows and minor children for the reasons I have heretofore enumerated.

I am quite sure the scrivener who drafted the act of May 23, 1928, had before him one of the former pension acts that limited its benefits to those who served in the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps. I do not think that the failure to include widows of soldiers of the Missouri State Militia or Provisional Missouri Militia was intentional, as theretofore Congress had firmly established the policy of placing the widows of the soldiers of these Missouri organizations on exactly the same footing as widows of persons who served with the regular military, naval, or marine forces of the United States during the Civil War period. The act of May 23, 1928, was evidently intended to liberalize and increase the pensions of all widows who have attained or may hereafter attain the age of 75 years, and in enacting this law, I am confident that no Member of Congress understood that the benefits of the act were to be withheld from certain widows who had previously been on an exact equality with the widows who are beneficiaries under the act of May 23, 1928. As similar mistakes and omissions in the past had been twice remedied by the adoption of the joint resolutions of February 15, 1895, and March 4, 1907, so the pending resolution will correct and cure the omission and mistake in the acts of May 1, 1920, July 3, 1926, and May 23, 1928.

I am sure no one will contend that by employing the language that was used in these last three acts, Congress intended to discriminate against the widows of soldiers who served in these two Missouri military units, and these acts did not indicate a deliberate departure from the theretofore well-established policy of placing all Civil War widows entitled to pensions on an equality without reference to the particular organization in which their soldier husbands served.

It is a reasonable inference that the draftsmen who drew the last three acts, in attempting to enumerate the classes that would get the benefit of an increase in pension, by inadvertence, failed to use language descriptive of the classes sufficiently broad to include those who have a pensionable status by reason of a soldier's service in the Missouri State Militia or the Provisional Missouri Militia.

Mr. SNELL. There are no new names added to the general law by this resolution?

Mr. LOZIER. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this is the situation, inasmuch as the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia actively cooperated with the Federal forces, they were given a pensionable status as far back as 1873. Later their widows and minor children were given the benefits of our pension laws. Our pension policy is reflected in numerous acts passed from time to time, and generally speaking, each act was more liberal than the previous ones. In many of these acts reference is made to previous acts or to a group or class pensioned by preceding acts. Some of these acts seem to have been loosely drawn, and fail to enumerate certain groups who had previously been granted a pensionable status under former enactments. These three acts mentioned in the pending resolution gave additional benefits to a certain class of pensioners, but failed to give these same benefits to another class of pensioners.

Mr. SNELL. And this is to give added benefits to men who are now drawing pensions?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; and to equalize pensions and prevent discrimination. This resolution, if adopted, will equalize the benefits and place the persons who belong to the same general class or group on exactly the same basis.

Mr. SNELL. How many men does this apply to?

Mr. LOZIER. I can not speak with certainty as to the number of persons that will be affected by this bill, probably less than 200. Yes; probably less than 100, but I can not indicate the exact number. Its chief effect will be to place all pensioned widows who have reached the age of 75 years on the same footing. Some now get $40 per month and others only $30. Widows of soldiers who served in the Missouri State Militia or the Provisional Missouri Militia and who are 75 years old, are now drawing only $30 per month. If this resolution is adopted these widows who have reached the age of 75 years will get $40 per month—the same amount that is now being paid to widows of soldiers who served as a part of the regular military or naval forces of the United States.

It was shown by the hearings that there is but a handful of persons who will be benefited by this act and it was estimated that the additional annual cost to the Government would range from $2,000 to $5,000, or a probable average additional annual cost of $3,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why does this resolution apply to the Missouri State Militia and not apply to the militia of Kentucky?

Mr. LOZIER. I understand that Missouri is the only State in the Union where the militia of this particular class, under their own officers, and under an arrangement with the War Department, cooperated with the Federal forces. I do not understand that the militia of Kentucky was organized on the same basis as the Missouri State Militia or the Provisional Missouri Militia, or under a similar arrangement between the State and the Federal Government.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is not a correct statement.

Mr. LOZIER. Kentucky, West Virginia, and some of the other border States organized militia companies known as home guards, but I do not think they were organized on the same basis as these Missouri regiments, nor did they cooperate with the Federal armies in the same way. I am not sure that any of these military units have been brought under the provisions of the general pension laws, but most of them, like the Enrolled Missouri Militia, have not yet been given a pensionable status. I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky that I think the time is ripe to extend the benefit of our general pension laws to the soldiers who served in the Enrolled Missouri Militia and in similar militia companies in the States of Kentucky and West Virginia and to the dependents of these soldiers. I will be glad to cooperate with the gentleman from Kentucky in securing a pensionable status for these old militiamen and their dependents. Only a few of these old soldiers are left, and, in view of our liberal pension policy, I think that these soldiers, their widows, and minor children should be given a pensionable status.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The militiamen of the State of Missouri were never nationalized and were never in the Union forces.

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman from Kentucky is correct, but the Provisional Missouri Militia and the Missouri State Militia both during and since the war were recognized by the Federal Government as being on a different basis than the Enrolled Missouri Militia, soldiers of which latter organization have never been given a pensionable status. And this resolution does not give a pensionable status to the members of the Enrolled Missouri Militia, though, as I have already stated, I believe the time has come when the members of these organizations and their dependents should be given the benefit of our beneficent pension policy.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Why did they call them "provisional"? In other words, why is it that the militia of Kentucky and West Virginia have not been placed on the provisional roll?

Mr. LOZIER. They were called "provisional" militia because they were provided for an immediate service and to meet an urgent necessity. Some of these West Virginia and Kentucky militia companies, like some of the Missouri militia companies, were not organized under an agreement between the States and the Federal Government and did not cooperate with the regular Federal forces in the same manner or to the same extent that these Missouri units cooperated with the regular troops of the United States. As I have stated, we have in Missouri quite a number of men who served in the Enrolled Missouri Militia, and they probably have the same status as your Kentucky militiamen, and they have not been given a pensionable status. As far back as 1873, when the character and extent of the services rendered by the several militia companies in the several States were well known, the Federal Government, recognizing the superior claims and superior service of the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia, granted the members of these organizations a pensionable status. The character of the service rendered by these different military units was then fresh in the minds of the American people, and this explains why Congress recognized the distinction as far back as 1873, when it granted a pensionable status to those who served in the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia and withheld these pension benefits from those who served in the militia companies of Kentucky and West Virginia.

Mr. KINCHELOE. How long have these provisional enrolled soldiers of Missouri had a pensionable status?

Mr. LOZIER. Since the act of March 3, 1873.

Mr. KINCHELOE. How many on the pension rolls from the Provisional Enrolled Militia of Missouri?

Mr. LOZIER. I can not answer the gentleman exactly, but nearly all of these old men are gone. Quite a number of their widows still survive, and it is my understanding that the Pension Bureau states that this resolution will only affect a handful of these soliders and their dependents, and that the additional expense to the Government will probably amount to about $3,000 annually.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I was not so much interested in that part of it as I was because it strikes me on the face of it, it is a discrimination.

Mr. LOZIER. As the gentleman well knows, all the pension acts, beginning right after the Civil War, made 90 days' service in the United States Army, under United States Army officers, a condition precedent for the granting of pensions.

Mr. KINCHELOE. And these provisional soldiers about whom the gentleman speaks now, had that status?

Mr. LOZIER. They were given a pensionable status by the act of March 3, 1873.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I remember that since I have been in Congress there was a bill proposed to give all the members of the home guard, as we call them in Kentucky, a pensionable status, and I recall that former Speaker Clark left the chair and made a speech here on the floor in favor of it. It passed the House, but was killed in the Senate.

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; I think the bill to which the gentleman from Kentucky refers was a bill to give a pensionable status to those who served in the Enrolled Missouri Militia, but those soldiers have never been given a pensionable status, and the pending resolution does not give them a pensionable status.

Of all the States that suffered from border warfare during the Civil War period, Missouri was probably most devastated by the rip tides and cross currents of the opposing armies of the North and South. The Union and Confederate forces alternately swept across the State, leaving woe and desolation in their wake. It was to meet this situation that the Federal Government created the Department of the West and the Department of the Missouri, and by the act of March 25, 1862, Congress provided—

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to allow and pay to the officers, noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates who have been heretofore actually employed in the military service of the United States, whether mustered into actual service or not, where their services were accepted and actually employed by the generals who have been in command of the Department of the West or the Department of the Missouri, the pay and bounty as in cases of regular enlistment.

This act further gave these officers and privates a pensionable status when wounded or incapacitated for service.

The act of March 25, 1862, placed those who served in Missouri Militia organizations (whose services were accepted, and who were actually used by the generals in command of the Department of the West or the Department of the Missouri, although not actually mustered into the Army of the United States) on a different basis than those who served in militia organizations in other States. They were given this preferred and pensionable status if their services were accepted and actually employed by the generals in command of the Department of the West or the Department of the Missouri.

Mr. TILSON. Is the gentleman ready to assure the House that this joint resolution does not enlarge the class that now draws pensions?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; this resolution adds no new class to the pension rolls. It will in some instances increase the allowance and remedy present discriminatory conditions. It does not give a pensionable status to any group or class of soldiers or their dependents who have not heretofore had and who do not now have a pensionable status.

Mr. TILSON. But it enables the members of the said class to take advantage of more recent laws. Is that the case?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut is correct. This resolution extends to the survivors of the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia who rendered service during the Civil War and their dependents, who now have title to pension under existing law, the advantage of the act of Congress approved May 1, 1920, the act of Congress approved July 3, 1926, and the act of Congress approved May 23, 1928. Under the present law these survivors are receiving $50 per month, and by extending the benefits of these acts to them they will be automatically increased to $65 per month, with further increase to $72 and $90 per month in case of partial or total disabilities. The widows of the Missouri State Militiamen and the Provisional Missouri Militiamen who have title under existing law now receive $30 per month. This will increase them to $50 per month under the provisions of the act of July 3, 1926, if married to the soldier prior to or during the period of his service during the Civil War.

It also allows them the benefits of the provisions of the act of May 23, 1928, increasing their pensions from $30 per month to $40 per month if they have or may hereafter attain the age of 75 years. All widows must show their husbands rendered 90 days or more military service and were honorably discharged from all contracts of service, or, regardless of the length of service, were discharged for or died in service of a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, and that they were married to the late soldier prior to June 27, 1905.

As I have stated, there are two precedents extending the benefits of existing pension laws to the survivors of the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Missouri Militia and their dependents. The first was a House joint resolution approved February 15, 1895, and the second was a House joint resolution approved March 4, 1907. I have already explained these resolutions in detail. The pending resolution extends the benefits of the acts of May 1, 1920, July 3, 1926, and May 23, 1928, so as to include the officers and privates of the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional Militia and their widows and minor children, just as House joint resolution, approved February 15, 1895, extended the provisions of the act of June 27, 1890, to these classes, and just as House joint resolution, approved March 4, 1907, extended the benefits of the act of February 6, 1907, to these same classes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the only criticism that can be made of this bill is that it does not go far enough. It should also provide a pensionable status for all who served during the Civil War in the Missouri Militia and the Provisional Enrolled Missouri Militia and their survivors. Thousands of loyal citizens of the State enlisted in these organizations, were armed and equipped by the Federal Government, commanded by Federal officers, fought side by side with Federal troops, and the State of Missouri has since been reimbursed for their services by the Federal Government. But because in the turmoil of war they did not happen to be sworn into the Federal service, that technicality has excluded them and their widows from the benefits of the pension laws enjoyed by their comrades, who rendered no greater service, endured no greater hardships, and contributed no more loyally to the preservation of the Union. It is to be hoped that in the near future their patriotic services will be recognized by legislation giving them equal pensionable status. But in the meantime this bill is a step in the right direction. It allows veterans who are now limited to a pension of $50 per month the advantage of recent enactments providing for increases to $65 per month, with a further increase to $72 and $90, respectively, in case of partial or total disabilities. It also permits widows now receiving $30 per month to take advantage of recent legislation authorizing increases to $40 and $50 per month, depending on date of marriage. For this reason the bill should be passed. It is to be hoped that it will also serve to call attention to the need for additional legislation providing for other members of Missouri organizations whose services in the war entitle them to the same consideration but who have for more than half a century been deprived of this deserved recognition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD]?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the Consent Calendar is a very heavy one, and I am loath to allow the gentleman to take 30 minutes on Consent Calendar day.

Mr. CONNERY. I will modify my request and ask for 20 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. What is the matter with to-morrow?

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman be ready to-morrow?

Mr. CONNERY. No; I am not ready for to-morrow, but I will be ready for Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. SNELL. Tuesday is to be a full day for the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. They have two bills that will take the entire day, Mr. Speaker. It would be all right to-morrow.

Mr. CONNERY. All right, Mr. Speaker. I will try to be ready to-morrow, and will change my request and ask for 30 minutes to-morrow.

Mr. TILSON. So far as I am concerned the gentleman can have as much time as he needs to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, he may address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Resolution 318, a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk to have read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization shall have one legislative day for the consideration of the following bills:

H. R. 16927, to clarify the law relating to the temporary admission of aliens to the United States.

H. R. 16926, granting preference within the quota to certain aliens trained and skilled in a particular art, craft, technique, business, or science.

S. 5094, making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law.

That after general debate on each bill, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the bill, each bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. In the case of the bill S. 5094, it shall be in order to consider without the intervention of the point of order, as provided in clause 7 of rule 16, the committee amendment recommended by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization now in the bill, and such committee amendment for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of the reading of each bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on each bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order three bills reported favorably by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. The bills are a bill to clarify the law relating to the temporary admission of aliens to the United States, a bill granting preference within the quota to certain aliens trained and skilled in a particular art, craft, technique, business, or science, and a bill making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law.

I might state that the so-called Schneider bill or naturalization bill is not in issue, neither is the Box quota bill.

This rule simply permits the consideration of these bills under the general rules of the House, permitting one hour general debate on each bill, with the exception that in the consideration of the Senate bill (S. 5094) the amendment which has been suggested by the committee may be considered without being subject to a point of order.

These are immigration bills and will be fully explained by the Immigration Committee when being considered.

Is any time desired in opposition to the rule?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Yes; I would like to have some time.

Mr. MICHENER. How much?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from New York 15 minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it has been said around this Chamber that these three bills are perfectly innocent and do not involve much controversy. The Rules Committee has reported this rule for consideration of these three bills at this short session of Congress. Some of us who shall listen to the debate on the bills will be anxious to find out just what emergency prompted their being brought in under a rule when so much important legislation is still pending in this short session.

During the six years that I have been in the House, and during all that time I have been on the Rules Committee, I have always had grave doubt about any immigration bill which was presented to this House. It is not so much the particular provisions of any immigration bill as it is the spirit behind the bill with which I am deeply concerned. Here to-day I want to discuss that spirit which I believe pervades our country to an alarming extent, and I want to discuss it without any thought of the past or recent events. I approach it looking to my country's future.

I believe that there are many people in this country to-day who fear that these United States of ours is the most intolerant, narrow-minded nation on the globe. I am not going to use any bromides about loving my country. That is the gratuitous mouthing of a demagogue. If I think my country is wrong, I propose to criticize it in its own citadel. I will defend it against attack from without, but I reserve the right to criticize it from within. I fear there is a spirit pervading our country to-day reflected in these immigration bills that is a menace to the country—a spirit of intolerance and bigotry not only to religions but to races.

Take the first bill, relating to the deportation of alien criminals. Has anybody ever said anything here about establishing a penal colony for the deportation of citizen criminals and putting out of the country the criminal citizen?

Take another bill before us to-day, the Box bill, relating to immigrants coming over our borders. It represents a spirit of superior intolerance to our neighbors on the north and south.

Oh, I do not like the spirit behind all these measures. There seems to be a spirit of bigotry and intolerance in America directed at the races of the rest of the world that surely is un-American. There are certain people in our country who believe that no other race on the face of the globe can be compared in education, in culture, in respectability to the inhabitants of the United States.

Let me state here, gentlemen, not in order to say anything sensational but to bring the truth forcibly before this body: Take a railroad train and go through the South, through the West, through the North, and in the outlying sections of the country look at what we call our own people, who have not had the opportunities of the people in the big cities. You will see American people of the Nordic races, you will see people whose forefathers were here 300 years ago, but you will see them in the lowest state of civilization. Is that the type to which you refer when you speak of the "American blood" in America? Yes; you will see them in rags and tatters; you will see them unkempt, uncultured, uneducated, and uncouth.

Then I suggest you take an automobile and ride through the so-called foreign sections of the big cities and see these foreign people whom you hate so vehemently. Look at their children going to school in droves, seeking every opportunity for education, eager to acquire and to assimilate all the customs and habits of our country. See them going through the grammar schools, the high schools, to the colleges, from Harvard to Stanford, eager to become a part of America and of its institutions.

Let me make this assertion here, after due consideration, that I believe that the foreigners in this country to-day on the whole furnish better material for citizenship than many of the so-called American types living in outlying sections of the country.

Oh, I do not consider that an attack on my country. Every one of these bills is directed at one or a few particular races. Why is that spirit rampant in America? It is daily commented upon in colleges in nearly every issue of the current magazines.

How long can demagogues in all political parties continue to preach this doctrine of saying "America for Americans only" and further foment this vindictive intolerance evidenced by these bills? It surely must result in damage to our country. It is a spirit of vindictiveness against anybody whose ancestors were not born here 300 years ago. I do not care what its effect is in elections, but I do care what effect it is going to have on our country in the future.

Where is this doctrine being preached? On the political stumps by demagogues. But, more than that, this doctrine of intolerance of "American" narrow-mindedness is being preached in the pulpits of our churches, from the rostrums of small communities where people go to learn the thought of their communities. This doctrine is being propagated through the country by what I believe to be an ignorant, uneducated, cleric party, and I have no hesitation in saying it.

I further have no hesitation in saying that the preachers of intolerance, and I am talking principally about intolerance to races, are the most uneducated of any profession in America; that the clergy of America are the least educated of any profession in America, but they have the most powerful influence of any profession in America. They get a smattering of general knowledge, a little ecclesiastical training, but no broad vision, and then they go into a community and try to shape the thought of that community and preach that the Italian, the Jew, the Irish, the German are not fit to live in America. That is the danger to America. The country is flooded I might say with "Elmer Gantrys" preaching an un-American doctrine. Many Members are as afraid of an immigration bill as they are of a prohibition bill. They fear what will be said about them at home if they take a position in opposition to them. The preachers will attack them.

It is not a bad rule in approaching legislation to "beware of the Greeks bearing gifts," to see what spirit is behind the legislation.

These three bills are not needed now, but they will go to credit some men here in their districts with having furthered the cause of intolerance. I am as much interested in this question of restrictive immigration as anybody else, but I do not want America to become so narrow that it feels that these people of the Old World can not furnish something to this country. They have, in fact, furnished a great deal it has to-day. This smug nationalism is the greatest snobbishness that any nation could wear on its countenance in facing the rest of the world. Much we have in this country to-day we owe to the immigrants who came here from the Old World. Everyone knows the spirit behind the 1924 immigration law, directed principally at two peoples, the Italians and the Jews. That spirit of the Ku-Klux Klan has continued to persist. The same spirit I believe pervades these three bills here to-day—the sanctimonious, self-opinionated conceit that nobody else except the natural-born American, whatever he may be, is fitted to enjoy our present-day America.

I am not so much interested for the moment in what happens in immigration legislation. Perhaps immigration should be regulated. Perhaps we should close the doors. But I do detest the giving of false economic reasons to disguise intolerance. I regret to see labor deceived and deluded by false economic reasons advanced, when I feel confident that the spirit behind the whole question is mean and contemptible and, worst of all, un-American. [Applause.]

REGULATING THE HEALING ART IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3936) to regulate the practice of the healing art, to protect the public health in the District of Columbia, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3936) to regulate the practice of the healing art in the District of Columbia, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Maryland in reference to the House amendment known as the Johnson amendment, whether he will bring that back to the House, if necessary, in order to have it incorporated in the bill as a part of the bill, and give the House an opportunity to vote upon it? The amendment was adopted by a considerable majority. I do not think it would be fair to the House for the House conferees to recede without giving the House an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, there are only two amendments. It is true there are three, but one of them is a corrective amendment of the text. Necessarily, the conference report would come back to the House for action.

Mr. ALMON. But if the conferees receded on this amendment and brought back the conference report, we would have to vote the conference report up or down.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand what the gentleman desires.

Mr. ALMON. I mean this: Rather than recede from the House amendment known as the Johnson amendment, that the gentleman give the House an opportunity to vote on it before receding. It is a very easy question to answer yes or no.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I do not see how the conferees could agree to bring it back for further instructions. We will bring back the conference report.

Mr. ALMON. I think the gentleman should agree to give the House an opportunity to vote upon it again rather than to let it go out.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman presumes that the conferees are going to let that go out. The conferees are bound by the action of the House and they represent the will of the House. We will insist upon the House amendments and my unanimous-consent request carried with it the provision that we insist on the House amendments.

Mr. ALMON. I hope that the House conferees will insist on the Johnson amendment.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. We hope to bring the bill back with the House amendments agreed to by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. ZIHLMAN, Mr. BOWMAN, and Mr. BLANTON.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propound an inquiry to the gentleman from Michigan. Does this rule provide that one hour of general debate shall be on each of these bills or one hour on all the bills combined.

Mr. MICHENER. On each bill.

Mr. SABATH. That is the information I desired.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, there being no further debate on the rule, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

TEMPORARY ADMISSION OF ALIENS TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under the rule just adopted by direction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I call up the bill H. R. 16927 for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16927) to clarify the law relating to the temporary admission of aliens to the United States

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of the immigration act of 1924 (U. S. C. title 8, sec. 203) is amended by inserting "(a)" after the section number and by adding at the end of the section a new subdivision to read as follows:

"(b) For the purposes of clause (2) of subdivision (a) of this section no alien shall be considered as visiting the United States temporarily as a tourist or temporarily for business or pleasure (1) if he is coming under an agreement already made, express or implied, to engage in or resume employment by a person in the United States, or employment in any business or industry of the United States whether or not the employer is a citizen or resident of the United States, unless in either case he would, if an immigrant subject to the contract-labor provisions of the immigration act of 1917, come within the specific exemptions of such provisions, or (2) if he is coming to seek employment in the United States."

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the Speaker call my attention when I have used 10 minutes?

Gentlemen of the House, this bill is not for the purpose of making any drastic change in the immigration law. It is for the purpose of making certain and clear the intent of the Congress with respect to one point of the immigration law of 1924, in view of certain court decisions which the committee believes have departed from the real intent of the Congress. When the immigration law of 1924 was adopted it was found necessary to permit certain persons to enter the United States as nonimmigrants. Those classes of persons were clearly set forth in the immigration law.

The classes of nonimmigrants, that is, persons who were not to be treated as immigrants at all, but who could come into the United States temporarily because they were not immigrants, were set forth in section 3 of the immigration law, and they are made up of six different classes of persons. The first class is the government official, his family, attendants, servants, and employees. That is, those who come here to represent another country as officials of that country are not immigrants to this country. Second, an alien visiting the United States temporarily as a tourist or temporarily for business or pleasure. Those people were not to be considered as immigrants. They could come in for a brief limited period and then depart without undergoing the rules and regulations of quota, and so forth, that govern immigrants. The third class was the alien in continuous transit through the United States. That is, if a man came from a foreign country and landed at New York, but his destination was Montreal, Canada, he could pass through the United States without becoming an immigrant to the United States. Fourth, an alien lawfully admitted to the United States and who later goes in transit from one part of the United States to another through a foreign contiguous territory. That is, an immigrant admitted lawfully to this country, living in Buffalo, but passing to Chicago across the lower part of Canada, did not become an immigrant again when reaching the United States at Detroit, and so forth. Now trouble has arisen with respect to the second class that I named, that is, the alien visiting the United States temporarily as a tourist or temporarily for business or pleasure. Certain persons have come to the borders of the United States and claimed the protection of this clause 2 as nonimmigrants on the ground that they were intending temporarily to enter the United States for business. That business in each of these instances has consisted of this, either going into the United States to engage in a job of labor or some employment for which they have a contract, or, second, going into the United States to hunt for a job as a laboring man, or in some such employment. It was never the thought of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization that a person coming into the United States to take a job, or to go about the country hunting for a job, was engaged in business. The intention the committee had is clearly expressed in its debates, and that was that we should not raise around the United States a Chinese wall through which business men, engaged in trade and having one part of such trade in a foreign country and the other part in this country—international commerce—ought not to be deprived of entering the United States temporarily for the purpose of carrying on a legitimate, substantial business which had, as I have said, a part of its situs in this country and part in another country.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Does this affect those coming into this country as teachers in schools and colleges and preachers?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. This provision has no reference to them. That is covered by another provision of the immigration act.

Now, then, a short time ago certain persons entered the country first at Detroit and then at Buffalo, and when they were excluded from entering they brought suit in the Federal court on the ground that they were entering under this clause 2 of this provision. They contended that they were entering temporarily for business. That "business" consisted in many of these cases of coming into the United States to take a job as a laboring man, a job that had already been contracted for, and the court, in the second circuit court of the United States, Judge Manton, ruled that such person entering the United States to take a job was entering the United States temporarily for business under the provision I have read to you. That has been followed by another case, where a man who appeared at the border formally stated that he had no job, and had had no opportunity to search for one, but that he had entered the United States temporarily for business, with the purpose of looking around the United States to get a job. The court held that this also came within the provisions of the law with reference to business.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I would rather be allowed to make a consecutive statement, if I may.

Those people came from Canada. The action of the court applies to them, no matter from what country they came to Canada. One case arose where a gentleman who came from a foreign country in an ocean steamship to New York claimed he had the right to enter the United States for business, that business being to hunt for a job. The court has ruled that he could come in under this provision. Up to date almost 2,000 aliens have entered the United States under these and similar court rulings, either to take a job or to look for one.

Now, the purpose of the committee in bringing before the House for consideration this particular bill is to cure the situation which we feel has arisen under these court decisions. This draft of the proposed bill is the result of most careful study not only on the part of members of the committee but on the part of those experts consulted by the committee who have helped us in making this draft. It provides that for the purpose of clause 2 of subdivision (a) of this section no alien shall be considered as visiting the United States——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I will yield myself five minutes more.

Visiting the United States temporarily as a tourist or temporarily for business or pleasure, under either of two circumstances: First, if he is coming to take an employment already entered into, express or implied; second, if he is coming to seek employment in the United States.

Under the first provision, coming in to resume or to take employment that has already been expressly or impliedly agreed upon, there has to be a certain limitation, which is contained in this proposed bill, because we have a contract labor law that has certain exceptions to it which have been found necessary by the Congress, and the limiting phraseology in this first portion of this paragraph is designed to save the validity of these exceptions to the anti contract-labor provisions of the law.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Is it not a fact that you can deport the very people who are attempted to be excluded by this bill under the act of 1920 and 1922?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. The gentleman suggests that at the end of the time of their temporary visit they may be deported if they remain over that length of time. I have suggested to the House that almost 2,000 people have been admitted to the United States or ordered admitted under court procedure under this loophole recently discovered. There are 2,000 already in, for the Department of Labor to try to keep track of, in the 3,000 miles that span this country from ocean to ocean, with the right to go to any part of it at any time they see fit under this court proceeding, and it seems to the committee, or to most of the committee, that it is better to stop the practice at the border than to try to hunt up the so-called "travelers" that have been admitted after the six months have expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Are the provisions of this bill sufficiently broad to apply to aliens coming from Mexico?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. They apply to both land borders of the United States, and also to the sea borders. It is not to be expected that so many visitors will arrive at the sea border, but the provision applies to all the borders of the United States.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Do you think this bill will cure it?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I think it will greatly relieve it.

Mr. BRIGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BRIGHAM. On the borders, both the Canadian and the Mexican, we have this condition, that citizens domiciled in Mexico and in Canada come daily across the border for employment in this country. What will be the effect upon them?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. If a person is domiciled in a foreign country—as, for example, in the case of Windsor, Canada—under this provision before he can continue to operate in any employment in Detroit he must comply with the law and be allowed to enter the United States as a quota immigrant or as an immigrant. Then, after he has received permission to enter the United States as a permanent immigrant, he is allowed under the law the right to depart at any time to a foreign country for not more than six months without losing his right to remain in the United States. So that if he wishes to have his house across the river in Canada and come in each morning to his work, after he has complied with the law, there is nothing in this provision that will prevent him from doing that.

Mr. BRIGHAM. If a person is a citizen of Norway, for instance, domiciled in Canada and comes across the border for employment in this country, in that event he would have to come as a quota immigrant under the Norwegian quota, would he not?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. He would.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire some time?

Mr. SABATH. Yes. As I understand the rule, the time is to be equally divided, 30 minutes on each side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit, this particular bill is not contentious.

Mr. SABATH. But that is the rule, and I always believe in living up to the rules of the House and the laws and regulations. That has always been my position.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Can the gentleman get along with 20 minutes?

Mr. SABATH. If I can, I will; but Judge Box is on this side, and as this is his bill he is entitled to some time.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. If the gentleman will permit, I desire to be entirely fair with him. I intend that he shall have time to speak and that the gentleman from Texas shall have time to speak. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Under the terms of the rule is it necessary for any agreement as to time? If the gentleman from Illinois is opposed to the bill, he is by right entitled to one-half hour.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. There is no objection on my part to that, and if the gentleman from Illinois desires that time, I will be glad to yield 30 minutes to him.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is not yielding anything.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this is a rather peculiar rule and it does not seem to be according to the usual rules. This is a House Calendar bill, and under the procedure of the House the gentleman from Michigan, having been recognized by the Chair, would have control of one hour and can do what he pleases in that hour. He can move the previous question or yield time for debate, but as this rule provides that one hour shall be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing the bill, that would supersede the ordinary rule to the extent of debate. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Michigan would retain control of the floor for the purpose of making such motions as he desires to make, and he only could do so. There is nothing in the rule which provides that any one particular person shall control the time, so that the Chair could recognize, in his discretion, any gentleman who was opposed to the bill and asked for recognition for one-half hour.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Without any necessity of yielding time by the other side?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be the proper way to proceed.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. I assume from the proceedings that have been had up to date on this bill that the Speaker holds that it is not necessary under the rule to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider these bills.

The SPEAKER. As to the first bill.

Mr. MAPES. And to that extent ignores the language of the rule which says that at the close of the consideration of each bill the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House.

The SPEAKER. Well, those bills are Union Calendar bills, and a motion would be necessary for the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House. This is a House Calendar bill.

Mr. MAPES. But the language of this rule says that at the conclusion of the reading of each bill mentioned in the rule the committee shall rise.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think that only referred to Union Calendar bills. Obviously we are not in the Committee of the Whole, and this bill must be considered in the House.

Mr. MAPES. So the Chair interprets that language as not meaning exactly what it says?

The SPEAKER. Quite so. In construing the rule it is necessary to assume that it does not mean what it says. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] for 30 minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I do not quite follow the remarks made by the member of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. VINCENT].

If a man enters this country for business purposes and it is found while in this country he is doing some other kind of work, there are certainly sufficient provisions in the deportation law to put him out. Now, how can we physically determine what he is going to do until he actually gets into the United States?

If a man should go before a consul—referring now to Montreal—and say, "I want to go to the United States for the purpose of business," what evidence has the consul that he will do anything else but that thing which he is speaking about, namely, that he is going to do some sort of business which he has the right to do under the treaty between the two countries?

After he gets here and it is found he is engaged as a hod carrier or as a laborer, there is enough in the deportation law to grab that man and throw him out. In other words, the man changes his status; and no person has a right to change his status; and under the present law even the Commissioner of Labor can not change your status once you are in here for business purposes or for pleasure.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Does the gentleman mean to say that under the court holdings that have been referred to, if a man is found laboring in this country he is immediately deportable? Have not the courts, on the contrary, held that that is business and therefore he is protected?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. In the first place, how can we find out what a man is going to do until he is actually in the United States and we see what he does? Suppose a man comes into the United States and does the very thing that he said he would do before the American consul, and that is that he is engaging in some business; and let us assume that the next day he abandons that business and goes to work as a laborer. How can we actually know these facts until this man actually gets in here? We can not determine these things while the man is crossing the border.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Would a young woman coming from Canada into my city, where perhaps 40 per cent of the population are from Canada, to act in the capacity of a nurse for a distant or near relative be debarred from coming in if she were to say when applying to be admitted that she is coming for a small consideration to look after a relative?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes. Under the present law she would be here under the contract-labor provision. It is a clear-cut case that the gentleman has illustrated; but that lady can come in here for the purpose of visiting and say nothing about compensation and take care of her relative or as many relatives as she wants to, but the moment she tells the American representative at the point of entry that she is coming here for the purpose of engaging in labor, under the present law she is under mandatory exclusion.

Mr. GIFFORD. Under this amendment she will be asked that and will have to say so.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. You are assuming a state of facts that does not appear in this record at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. In just a moment. What we should do in this case, if we want to fix the law and put the law where it should be, is to put Canada under the quota and let each person enter the United States accordingly.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. The gentleman said that a nurse coming in under the situation presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts would fall afoul of this provision. Nurses are under the exceptions of the contract labor law and therefore are particularly excepted.

Mr. GIFFORD. I did not mention a nurse.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Prior to the act of 1924 a nurse or a lawyer or a doctor was exempt from the quota. In the act of 1924 we eliminated all professions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] inquired about a person coming from Canada. Canada is not under the quota and therefore a nurse can come in under the exemption of the contract labor law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, clearly, is to meet a situation now existing concerning countries that do not come under the quota. I think I am correct in that.

Mr. BOX. It applies to others, too.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It applies to others, but the cases of violation of the visitors' privileges from countries coming under the quota are individual cases. From Canada and Mexico you have wholesale and daily abuse of that privilege.

I want to point out to the Committee on Immigration that there is only one way to cure that situation, as suggested by my colleague from New York, and if you want to be perfectly fair about this, if you are really intent and bent upon protecting American labor, the way to do it is to put Mexico and Canada under the quota. [Applause.]

The trouble, gentlemen, is this. I have read the hearings before the committee on the Mexican situation. The committee was inclined to apply the quota rule to Mexico, but there was tremendous pressure brought to bear by the beet growers and the railroads. They frankly told you that they preferred green labor from Mexico to the Mexicans born and raised in New Mexico, because they could get longer hours and could get them to work for lower wages. Now when you come here and say you are seeking to protect the American labor market, you are estopped from taking that position until you apply the quota law to Mexico and Canada.

We have had conditions in the building trades up North where contractors went into Canada to get stonemasons and bricklayers and bricklayers' helpers because they could get them cheaper. Yet the committee comes here and seeks to apply the most rigid and strict quota provisions to the countries of Europe under the pretext that they are protecting American labor when, as a matter of fact, the very law encourages and countenances the worst kind of peonage labor we have ever had in the history of this country. As long as the doors of Mexico are open to laborers for railroads and beet growers—on starvation wages—do not talk about protecting American labor.

The conditions under which Mexicans are working in the beet fields are nothing short of inhuman and disgraceful. The growers frankly told you that they wanted that kind of labor. They want the peon labor that will huddle in huts and accept contracts whereby they work whole families under the contract system at ridiculously low wages. That is the condition possible under the immigration policy. That is what is destroying the American standard of wages, and not permitting these people to live up to any kind of a standard of living.

Let us be perfectly frank about this. If it is desired to remedy existing evils, then go to the root of the evil. When a man comes as a visitor it is the intent of the law that he must be a bona fide visitor, it is not the individual cases that is the real trouble, it is the wholesale importations of thousands and thousands of peon labor which the law permits and the supporters of this bill tolerate and countenance.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I have had pending for some time a bill placing quota restrictions on Mexico and Canada and other American countries which I am heartily supporting, but that is not what is involved here, and I do not wish to divert your minds from the question before you.

This bill is intended to clarify the law and make it read exactly what your committee understood the law to be when the act of 1924 was written, and what we think you want it to be now.

The decisions were clearly outlined by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. VINCENT], and are to the effect that one coming to the United States to work as a laborer at a job, or when coming to seek employment, is coming for business within the exception stated in the act of 1924. They hold it to be a temporary visit for the purpose of business. It has not been so understood by the committee nor has the Department of Labor so construed it.

This is an effort to carry forward the law as we understood that we had written it, but those provisions have been impaired by these decisions, the effect of which is to nullify the contract labor provisions of the law in so far as they apply to a man coming to work, holding a job he already has, or to seek one.

If you will remember the contract provisions of the labor law, they are designed especially to prevent men from going into foreign countries and making contracts with laborers and others and importing them into the United States for that purpose. That has been of itself a sufficient reason for exclusion in the administration of the law as it existed heretofore. It is intended now that the meaning shall be made plain so that the man who comes seeking a job and the man who comes to hold a job already obtained will not be held to be within the exception.

There are two questions involved in these decisions as I construe them, but we are dealing directly with one of them here. I think there is no doubt that if it finally becomes a law it will apply to labor-seeking aliens from every country who are not excluded by other provisions of the law, such as those ineligible to citizenship and those from the barred zone. Aliens from every country except such as are specially barred coming temporarily for the purpose of seeking or holding employment as laborers will be admitted unless the court's ruling is changed by the Supreme Court or unless Congress changes the statute as are now proposed to do.

I am informed that the court admitted an Italian at the port of New York on the ground that he was coming temporarily to seek employment. The purpose of this is not to present to you any radical change in the law. I wish it were more drastic, but I shall not oppose it merely because it does not go all the way I would have it go.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman state that this Italian who came to the port of New York was coming as a visitor?

Mr. BOX. Yes; seeking employment. Most gentlemen who have spoken against this bill have been a little bit wrong on this point—I do not know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] fell into that error—but when the immigrant comes we do not wait until he gets in to determine whether he is coming for a lawful purpose. We examine him to see if he is coming as a contract laborer. These people declare their purpose on entering the country. We examine them to see if they are coming as contract laborers within the meaning of the act as it has existed for years.

The purpose of this bill is to bar them when their intent develops at the port, and it is the duty of the administrative officers to discover that intent in order to enforce the law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman stated there is a case in New York where the court held that an immigrant from Italy who came here and afterwards was looking for work——

Mr. BOX. No; not afterwards. He came here declaring that his purpose was to look for work.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Was he a quota immigrant?

Mr. BOX. No; he was seeking to enter as a temporary visitor for business within what the court held to be the meaning of the act of 1924.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But that was not the intent of the act.

Mr. BOX. Your committee has its own convictions about the meaning of that law and what construction ought to be given it, but it does not seem proper for Congress to array itself against what the courts have done so far. We hope that any error they have made will be rectified, but the breach developed by this decision is a serious one. As the gentleman from Michigan said, some 2,000 have already been admitted, and great numbers of others may be admitted in the course of a few months or a few years, both from the northern and southern borders, and also from the coastlines. While gentlemen might not be willing to go along with me to what they regard is an extreme length in dealing with immigration from Mexico and other countries, I think this legislation is essentially sound, and if you want to maintain the contract-labor provisions of your law as they now are, you ought to support this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As I understand this bill, it would not touch such a case as was stated a while ago by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD]. That was the case of a nurse coming in.

Mr. BOX. It adds no new features to the law as we thought we were writing it in 1924. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] afterwards said that he did not intend that to apply exclusively to a nurse, but under the law as it has been construed up until recently, if she came for the purpose of engaging in any form of contract labor, she would have been excluded heretofore. This amendment is written for the purpose of making it plain hereafter that the law is just as Congress intended it before.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If the gentleman will permit, I think I stated the law correctly when I stated to the House that a person who enters the United States for the purpose of business, and who states to the immigration officers that she is to be employed as a nurse for compensation, would be mandatorily excluded under the present act.

Mr. BOX. Under the court decisions they come in temporarily. The gentleman also said that if she would keep her mouth shut, in other words, hide from the department what she had in her mind, she might be admitted, and after she had hidden the facts, including her intent and, being in truth a contract laborer, had disclosed the fact by her subsequent conduct, then the Government could hunt her up and take her out; but I say now, in discussing that pertinent question, that while your Government is deporting about 12,000 people annually who are illegally in the country, the administrative officers admit that they are not doing anything like all of the deporting that ought to be done, and this argument that we should leave the gap open and let them come in and thereafter catch them and take them out does not appear to me to be sound.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. According to my experience 20 years ago as an immigration official, all of the real contract-labor cases that were detected were detected after they landed, because contract labor does not arrive at the port of entry and tell its whole story.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman may have found that condition existing 20 years ago, and doubtless many contract laborers yet get in, but if he will examine the reports of the Commissioner General of Immigration he will find that great numbers are excluded at the port and deported because of the fact that they try to come in in violation of the contract labor law, and that is developed upon their application for admission—great numbers of them.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes, if I have the time.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am very much for the rule and for the bill, but it seems to me that so many more people are coming in——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will also extend my question and the answer to it at the same time. [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I presume some Members will be surprised when I give my reasons for opposing this bill. They are not because of what it does but because of the things that should have been added to the bill that are not embodied in it. I want to make impossible such things as are complained of to-day, where a large number of aliens are coming in for work. This law applies only to those people who reside in Canada or Mexico, who are not Mexicans or Canadians, or South American or West Indian born citizens. A Mexican, or a Canadian, or those born in Central or South America, Cuba, or the West Indies may come in here now, in as large numbers as they desire, and they do come. There is no quota against any of them. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box] and myself have tried to place Mexico, Canada, and Central and South America, including the West Indies, under the quota basis. If that had been done we could have accomplished much more than the gentleman from Texas has finally succeeded in obtaining in this bill. So I am not, as I stated, opposed to the bill because of what it does but because of the things that are not embodied in the bill, which I think it should provide for. I take the attitude that if there is a law of the land, it should be upheld. I do not believe that any judge or any administrative official should evade the law by placing an erroneous or false construction upon its provisions.

I feel that if any man comes here in violation of the law, or is trying to come, he should be deported or should be precluded. But let us see to whom this act applies. You gentlemen remember that up to a few years ago there was a law providing that aliens who had resided in Canada or Mexico for a period of one year could enter the United States in the same manner as those who had been born in those countries. A little later on Congress extended that one-year provision to three years. Finally, a few years thereafter, Congress extended it to five years, making it impossible for a man to come from Mexico or Canada or one of these other countries to the United States if he was not born in one of them or if he had not resided within the borders of one of them at least five years; and then in the act of 1924 we eliminated completely the time limit and provided that no one, no matter how many years he may have resided in Mexico, Canada, Cuba, or one of the South or Central Americas, can enter the United States outside of the quota if he is not a native of one of those countries. So we completely cut out those people who have resided there for years without giving them a fair chance or opportunity, as I pleaded for them to have from time to time when these immigration bills were under consideration here. Now the blame is all placed upon those people. I have repeatedly called your attention to the fact that the blame is not with them.

The blame lies with the steamship companies and with the department which permit these steamship companies to mislead the people and bring them in under false pretenses, telling them if they will make the voyage on a Canadian steamship they would bring them to Canada and they could then enter the United States.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman, as I understand, complained against this bill that it does not apply the quota to Canada, Mexico, and South American countries?

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to ask if, when the general immigration restrictive law was passed, the gentleman voted to apply the quota to all nationalities coming into this country?

Mr. SABATH. At that time, if my memory serves me right, I was in favor of treating all nations and all peoples equally and fairly.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Did the gentleman vote for the general restrictive law which we passed here several years ago, in 1924?

Mr. SABATH. I did not, because I said then that it was a discriminatory measure because under the old law it was claimed they were protecting the American laboring man, and yet nearly 200,000 were permitted to enter from Canada, Mexico, and so forth, and then as to other sections, we cut to the minimum those classes which have demonstrated their loyalty to this Nation. There are many who have thus been very unjustly discriminated against; who have proven their desirability, and who have proven their loyalty and their patriotism. That is why I voted against that bill and knowing what the real conditions have been for the last three years; how these Canadians, and especially Mexicans, were being brought in, thus becoming competitors of the American laboring man, I have been advocating that all these nations—not one, but all of them—be placed on an equal quota basis. I have consistently pleaded here that we be big enough, broad enough, capable enough, and courageous enough to treat all peoples alike.

That was my position heretofore, and it is my position now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. No; I regret I can not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Just for a question?

Mr. SABATH. I will yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman help the committee prepare bills to do just what he has outlined?

Mr. SABATH. I will do it with pleasure. The gentleman knows I have always advocated equity and justice, fairness to all, and special privileges to none. As a Democrat I can not do otherwise. That has been my policy, and that is the reason why in my youth I joined the party that upholds these policies and these principles.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is it the gentleman's interpretation of the measure before us that it applies only to citizens of South and Central American States?

Mr. SABATH. It applies to everyone who is not a native, if he comes here seeking work under the pretense that he desires to engage in business. In other words, the courts have ruled that a man coming here for work means "business" under our treaty and under certain court rulings, and that is what the committee is trying to rectify.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman's understanding of this bill before us is that it applies to all coming in under the guise of "visitors" if their actual purpose is to seek work?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am for this bill, and I am much interested in the stand the gentleman is taking to exclude those people from entering through Mexico and Canada. May I ask why your committee has not reported out a bill and given us an opportunity to pass upon that question?

Mr. SABATH. I will admit this, that it is a very complicated proposition, and there are many things involved. [Laughter.] I can frankly say also that it has been charged that the railroad industry and the textile industry and to some extent the cotton industry do not want those people excluded because they tend to lower the price of labor. Those are not the only reasons—I will be candid with you—that enter into this proposition [laughter], and I would not want to be altogether too harsh with the gentleman's side of the House by charging that through its committee it has been neglecting to bring in such a measure.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman admit that it is discriminatory that the farmer should have a quota from Mexico and from Canada? So far as the gentleman's position is concerned, it is his party that professes to oppose special privileges to any.

Mr. GREEN. We want a quota put upon Mexico.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. How about the cotton producers?

Mr. SABATH. I will say that the demand does not come from the southern Democrats, but it comes from the great cotton industry in the South, whose exponents happen to have developed a Republican organization recently; and it also comes from that section of the country that controls the railroads and the beet-sugar industry. You surely will not charge that the sugar barons have contributed anything to the southern Democracy at any time.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentlemen from the South who fight against this are not Republicans.

Mr. SABATH. We have some gentlemen from the South who are standing at all times for the Democracy of the Nation. They are not all absolutely correct in everything they say, or everything they write about, or go to. I agree that they have been wrong sometimes; they are wrong many times, but I hope that in the very near future we who do believe in Democracy and fair play and who are against unjustifiable discriminations, will be able to convince even those gentlemen from the South who heretofore have been so fair, and in the future persuade them to meet us fairly and justly in granting the requests and propositions that we in the North and in the East stand for and advocate.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The gentleman must admit that if this committee should report out such a bill, the House would pass it, and that the only reason we do not have this legislation is because the committee of which the gentleman is a member has failed to report it.

Mr. SABATH. I want to say this, that I do not think there is a harder working committee in the House than the Committee on Immigration, and I am in a hopeless minority there. But I will say that these men on the majority side of the committee are sincere and honest and are trying to do the best they can for the country. When it comes to the matter of the consideration here of any proposed legislation that sounds like prohibition or restriction of immigration, why, you could bring in any kind of a bill, even a bill to deport me and half a dozen others who have the courage to come out and do certain things that do not suit certain restrictionists, and the majority might vote for such a bill. The trouble is we have not been tolerant enough and broad enough, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] stated only a few moments ago. I hope the prejudice that has been prevailing throughout the Nation in the last few years will soon become a matter of the past and that we will all treat one another fairly and justly and show some of that brotherly love that we hear so much about here and there on the part of certain people.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Has any bill ever been offered in the committee to deport those distinguished Nordics like Fall, Sinclair, and Daugherty, who stole the Nation?

Mr. SABATH. No; but they are not foreign born, you see.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. They are Nordics.

Mr. SABATH. Well, when we come to the question of deportation, I will show you who is being deported, and perhaps I will demonstrate that we deport much larger numbers of Nordics than we do of those from southeastern Europe or those against whom we have been legislating in the last eight years or so—since 1920.

Not wishing to delay the House, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude; and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will not the bill be read for amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, the bill already having been read. The Chair, as he stated before, thinks this is not a very well-drawn rule, but the Chair thinks that the only amendment to the rules of the House that this rule makes is with reference to debate. As far as the control of the floor is concerned, it remains under the regular rules of the House; so that the gentleman from Michigan, having retained the floor, is entitled to move the previous question if he so desires.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman withhold his motion to order the previous question so that I may offer the following amendment:

SEC. 2. All of the provisions of the immigration act of 1924 shall hereafter apply to the Dominion of Canada and the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. I can not yield the floor for that purpose, Mr Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VINCENT of Michigan, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. JENKINS and Mr. GRIFFIN rose.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, it shall be my aim to discuss the changes in the immigration laws as proposed by the three bills passed by the House on Friday, February 15, and Saturday, February 16. I do this in the belief that it may be of interest to Members who have not had time to study the matter carefully and because of a widespread interest in all immigration matters. These bills are known as the Box bill, the Free bill, and the Johnson deportation bill. These bills deal with entirely different phases of the immigration law and will be treated separately. Each of these bills must receive favorable action from the Senate and the President before it becomes a part of the law of the land.

THE BOX BILL

It must be made clear at the outset that this is not the Box bill that has received so much publicity in connection with putting Mexico and the Mexicans under the quota law. That bill will not be considered further in the present session of Congress. The Box bill as it passed the House Friday, February 15, is short, and because of the importance of getting the exact language I am incorporating it into my remarks.

It is subdivision (b) of section 3 as hereinafter printed. To better understand the proposed amendment I am inserting the whole of section 3 with the proposed amendment:

SEC. 3. (a) When used in this act the term "immigrant" means any alien departing from any place outside the United States destined for the United States, except (1) a Government official, his family, attendants, servants, and employees; (2) an alien visiting the United States temporarily as a tourist or temporarily for business or pleasure; (3) an alien in continuous transit through the United States; (4) an alien lawfully admitted to the United States who later goes in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory; (5) a bona fide alien seaman serving as such on a vessel arriving at a port of the United States and seeking to enter temporarily the United States solely in the pursuit of his calling as a seaman; and (6) an alien entitled to enter the United States solely to carry on trade under and in pursuance of the provisions of a present existing treaty of commerce and navigation.

(b) For the purposes of clause (2) of subdivision (a) of this section no alien shall be considered as visiting the United States temporarily as a tourist or temporarily for business or pleasure (1) if he is coming, under an agreement already made, express or implied, to engage in or resume employment by a person in the United States, or employment in any business or industry of the United States whether or not the employer is a citizen or resident of the United States, unless in either case he would, if an immigrant subject to the contract labor provisions of the immigration act of 1917, come within the specific exemptions of such provisions, or (2) if he is coming to seek employment in the United States.

NEED FOR LEGISLATION

The necessity for the passage of the Box bill arises from an unexpected interpretation having been put in the words "temporarily for business" as used in clause (2) of subsection (a). Aliens coming over from Canada refused to recognize the authority of the Department of Labor to prevent them from coming into the United States to carry on their jobs or to seek new jobs. They interpreted the words "temporarily for business" to include a person coming in to seek employment. In a test case in the United States court they were upheld. The case is now in the Supreme Court of the United States for final decision. Without a favorable court decision or without remedial legislation the whole fabric of the immigration law would be torn to pieces.

Under the interpretation of the law as held by the Labor Department, citizens of Canada could come into the United States upon complying with the regulations of the department, and citizens of the United States could pass to and fro from Canada without hindrance upon complying with regulations as to identity, and so forth, but it was contrary to our whole immigration system for aliens to come and go as they wished. Under our theory it was expected that they should come under and within the quota of their country and not free from quota. The proposition involved is easily understood, and the wonder is that it had not presented itself earlier.

The situation may be remedied by the Supreme Court when it comes to decide the question, but the legislative branch of the Government should assume its responsibilities without throwing any of the responsibility upon the court. If the Box bill becomes a law the aliens who present themselves at the Canadian and Mexican borders will be compelled to come in as quota immigrants, with proper papers from American consuls in the countries from which they come.

THE FREE BILL

At the present time provision is made in the immigration law for the admission of certain classes of aliens for temporary purposes. These are outside of the quotas. One of these classes includes skilled laborers. They are admitted only for a limited time and upon a showing that "labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country." There was no very urgent reason for the passage of the Free bill, for the law already provides a way by which highly skilled technicians can be brought in.

The bill at first sought to bring these into the country outside the quota. The vigilant restrictionists opposed this and only reluctantly granted support to the measure, after amendments which provide that there should be no increase of immigration outside the quotas. To meet this demand the bill as passed provides that the preferences within the quotas should be rearranged slightly so that these skilled workmen might come in with the same preference as fathers and mothers of citizens and with the same preference given to skilled agriculturists. These skilled technicians will not be allowed to come within this preferred class except after a showing by the company or person wishing their services that persons of like skill and training can not be found unemployed in the United States.

The sole object of the law is to permit this class of persons to come in as immigrants with a right to stay after entry. Without this law they could come but their presence would never ripen into citizenship. Since they come within the quota the only difference their coming will make under this bill, if it becomes a law, is that skilled mechanics and technicians will take the place of the same number of immigrants of the general class who may be in line waiting their turn. It is estimated that the number who will come under the provisions of the law will be very small. If the restrictions are faithfully enforced the number should be reduced to a mere handful, for our great country has within its borders men skilled in all the crafts and arts and sciences and capable of doing practically any work that can be done anywhere. For ready reference, I am inserting the law with the proposed amendment. Clause (B) is the proposed amendment:

(1) Fifty per cent of the quota of each nationality for such year shall be made available in such year for the issuance of immigration visas to the following classes of immigrants, without priority of preference as between such classes: (A) Quota immigrants who are the fathers or the mothers, or the husbands by marriage occurring after May 31, 1928, of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over; (B) quota immigrants who, being trained and skilled in a particular art, craft, technique, business, or science, are needed by bona fide employers to engage in work to perform which persons so trained and skilled can not be found unemployed in the United States, and the wives and the dependent children under the age of 21 years of such immigrants, if accompanying or following to join them; and (C) in the case of any nationality the quota for which is 300 or more, quota immigrants who are skilled in agriculture, and the wives and the dependent children under the age of 21 years of such immigrants skilled in agriculture, if accompanying or following to join them. Preference under clause (B) of this paragraph shall not be given to any alien claiming to be so trained and skilled unless the Secretary of Labor, upon the application of any person interested and after full hearing and investigation of the facts in the case, determines that a bona fide employer needs persons so trained and skilled and that such persons can not be found unemployed in the United States. The determination of the Secretary of Labor shall be transmitted to the consular officer through the Secretary of State. Such determination of the Secretary of Labor shall also be considered for the purposes of the fourth proviso of section 3 of the immigration act of 1917 as his determination of the necessity for importing such skilled labor.

THE JOHNSON DEPORTATION BILL

This bill is a modified form of the Holaday bill passed by the House of the Sixty-ninth Congress. The deportation laws are inadequate, but they are not much more inadequate than the appropriations furnished to the Labor Department to carry on the work of deportation. To deport an alien entails a great expense. Many aliens have been apprehended but were not deported for lack of funds. The department has deported practically no aliens except those that have been thrust upon it out of the penal institutions of the country. Very little work of hunting up aliens is done by the department. Too frequently we have heard the public speaker appeal to the patriotism of his audience in ringing sentences demanding those who do not subscribe to our system of government and who do not respect our institutions should be sent back from whence they came. This sentiment is strong in our country, but the tremendous handicap under which the Labor Department has been attempting to carry on its work because of lack of funds is not well known.

The Department of Labor has been deporting aliens at the rate of about 12,000 per annum. Several thousand others have been permitted to leave the country without having been forcibly deported. This is done to save time and expense. Many thousands have been turned back at the ports of entry. On the Mexican border immigration officials have, on many occasions, taken back to the borders many who had entered illegally and ordered them back into their native country without the formalities of a technical deportation.

There is a marked increase in the use of narcotics and stimulating drinks of various kinds. Aliens who engage in this traffic are deportable under this proposed law.

Aliens convicted in a court of record of carrying dangerous weapons or bombs, and sentenced to imprisonment for six months or more, and aliens convicted for a second offense of the same kind may be deported under the proposed law.

Aliens convicted in a court of record for manufacturing, selling, or transporting intoxicating liquor and sentenced to imprisonment for a year or more, and aliens convicted in a court of record for a second or subsequent offense and sentenced to imprisonment for a combined period of one year or more are deportable under this bill if it becomes a law.

Under the present law it is very doubtful whether a bootlegger alien can be deported for the reason that the courts have held quite uniformly that violation of the liquor laws does not "involve moral turpitude." If the bill under discussion becomes a law, the bootlegger and the gunman may be deported after conviction as above indicated. The gunman and the bootlegger do more to encourage the spirit of lawlessness in our country than any other class of criminals. No gunman or persistent bootlegger should be permitted to foment lawlessness in our country when they do not have or feel the responsibility of citizenship.

The Johnson bill also provides for the deportation of aliens who violate or conspire to violate the Mann white slave law and aliens who aid in procuring the unlawful entry of other aliens. Habitual criminals are also included under the provisions of the proposed law.

Many of the aliens unlawfully in the country came in as sailors and remained in the country in violation of the law. This law provides that an alien seaman once deported can not have landing privileges as allowed by the La Follette Act to the crew of any vessel stopping at our ports.

A very significant provision of this proposed law is that which provides that an alien who has once been arrested and deported can not reenter and that if he reenters or attempts to reenter he will be subject to a heavy fine and a severe penalty of imprisonment.

In order to assist the Labor Department in its enforcement of this proposed law it is provided that upon the final conviction of an alien in a court of record it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court to immediately report said conviction to the Department of Labor.

The most effective weapon against unlawful immigration is efficient deportation. An alien prefers almost any imprisonment to being deported to the land from whence he came. Since our country is committed to a policy of restriction of immigration, we will always have the deportation question with us. A well-considered deportation law, thoroughly enforced, would go a long way toward commanding respect for our immigration laws.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. My point of order is that the Speaker did not put the question in such a way as to give an opportunity to vote in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker certainly did. He waited for quite an appreciable length of time.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It was not audible here.

ADMISSION OF ALIENS

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I call up H. R. 16926, granting preference within the quota to certain aliens trained and skilled in a particular art, craft, technique, business, or science.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and under the rule the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16926, with Mr. ACKERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16926, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of section 6 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended by the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution relating to the immigration of certain relatives of United States citizens and of aliens lawfully admitted to the United States," approved May 29, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 1009), is amended to read as follows:

"(1) Fifty per cent of the quota of each nationality for such year shall be made available in such year for the issuance of immigration visas to the following classes of immigrants, without priority of preference as between such classes: (A) quota immigrants who are the fathers or the mothers, or the husbands by marriage occurring after May 31, 1928, of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over; (B) quota immigrants who, being trained and skilled in a particular art, craft, technique, business, or science, are needed by bona fide employers to engage in work to perform which persons so trained and skilled can not be found unemployed in the United States, and the wives, and the dependent children under the age of 21 years, of such immigrants, if accompanying or following to join them; and (C) in the case of any nationality the quota for which is 300 or more, quota immigrants who are skilled in agriculture, and the wives, and the dependent children under the age of 21 years, of such immigrants skilled in agriculture, if accompanying or following to join them. Preference under clause (B) of this paragraph shall not be given to any alien claiming to be so trained and skilled unless the Secretary of Labor, upon the application of any person interested and after full hearing and investigation of the facts in the case, determines that a bona fide employer needs persons so trained and skilled and that such persons can not be found unemployed in the United States. The determination of the Secretary of Labor shall be transmitted to the consular officer through the Secretary of State. Such determination of the Secretary of Labor shall also be considered for the purposes of the fourth proviso of section 3 of the immigration act of 1917, as his determination of the necessity for importing such skilled labor."

SEC. 2. Section 1 of this act shall take effect July 1, 1929, except that the determinations thereunder by the Secretary of Labor may be made at any time after the enactment of this act.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FREE], who will explain the provisions of the bill.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Burnett Act of 1917, an act which dealt particularly with contract labor, contained this proviso:

Provided further, That skilled labor, if otherwise admissible, may be imported if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country, and the question of the necessity of importing such skilled labor in any particular instance may be determined by the Secretary of Labor upon the application of any person interested, such application to be made before such importation, and such determination by the Secretary of Labor to be reached after a full hearing and an investigation into the facts of the case.

Under that provision of the law the Department of Labor adopted elaborate provisions as to the manner of proving that such labor was needed and all the other things incidental to bringing it in. All went well until the passage of the quota immigration law. When the numerical limitation was superimposed upon the Burnett law the exemptions afforded by the latter statute became practically a nullity in respect of aliens born in the quota countries of Europe. Aliens born in nonquota countries of the Western Hemisphere could still avail themselves of the exempting provision, but aliens born in Europe could not do so. To partially take care of the practical difficulty thus presented, the Department of Labor for the past four years or more has been going through the routine of determining the admissibility of certain highly skilled aliens under the above-quoted proviso, and the Department of State, accepting the Labor Department's determinations, has visaed passports for the admission of these people as nonimmigrants entering temporarily for business.

This has been an unsatisfactory arrangement in many respects, for although it has permitted the temporary entry of a limited number of persons much needed in particular industries, it had included no provision for their permanent stay, or for the entry of their dependents, or for their acquisition of American citizenship. In other words, while some industries have been benefited in greater or less degree, the incoming aliens, their dependents, and their employers have been put to great inconvenience; and the administration of the law has been embarrassed by a procedure which, although not unlawful, has been cumbersome and almost impossible of explanation.

This bill would amend the preference provisions of the immigration act of 1924 so as to facilitate the admission as quota immigrants of certain highly skilled workmen needed by American industries for the performance of specialized work, or for the development of improved methods or processes, when labor of like qualifications can not be found unemployed in the United States. The bill does not increase the number of immigrants. It simply provides that these immigrants, together with certain relatives and together with certain persons admitted for agricultural purposes, shall have a preference of 50 per cent of the quota.

This particular bill has been approved by both the Department of State and the Department of Labor. I wish to read a letter in regard to this bill written to me by Secretary of Labor Davis:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 13, 1929.

Hon. ARTHUR M. FREE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It is a source of much gratification to me to know that your bill granting a preference within the immigration quotas to certain aliens skilled in a particular art, craft, technique, business, or science has been favorably reported from committee and will soon be considered by the House of Representatives.

From discussions with various Members of the House I have no doubt that the bill will be passed practically without opposition, and I am quite sure that the Senate will also take favorable action. It has long been perfectly apparent to the Department of Labor that an amendment of this nature would very greatly increase the practical value of the quota-limit system and this need has become increasingly apparent from year to year as our experience has progressed.

I have repeatedly advocated legislation along this line and have considered many proposed amendments, but I am happy to say that the language you have adopted in your bill is by far the best that has ever come to my attention, for the reason that it provides in unusually clear language the precise authority necessary to carry our ideas into effect. I am thoroughly convinced that the enactment of your bill into law would prove to be the most important step in the development of a sensible system of immigration control since the quota limit law was enacted.

While it is true that we have become the greatest industrial Nation in the world, it is also true that we can still learn many things from other lands, and I am convinced that the further extension of our present industries and the development of new processes, or even entirely new industries, will be very materially enhanced by making possible the coming of the classes enumerated in your bill when they are needed by American employers or interests. I do not believe that it is an exaggeration to say that our future immigration policy and control will be very largely based on the principle contained in the legislation which you have proposed.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES J. DAVIS,
Secretary of Labor.

The Secretary of Labor has called attention to some cases that have come before the department, citing particularly the illustration of a technical worker who was needed in the cotton mills of New England and could not be admitted for some two and a half years on account of the great number applying under the quota, and yet during the time this technical worker was kept out, who by reason of processes which he would have installed would have resuscitated an industry that needed help, perhaps 10,000 textile workers who were not skilled came in.

There are various illustrations of different types of labor. I remember, back at Stanford University, when it was being built, they decided upon a plan that the center building to the rear of the inner quadrangle should be a church, which would be elaborately covered with mosaics and paintings of one kind and another. There was not at that time any individual in the United States who could do that work, and two men had to be brought over from Italy to do it.

At the time we installed the cranes and dredges for the Panama Canal we had to bring over two Germans to do the work.

Under the present law these people have to come in either as temporary visitors, which would not permit them to stay if they did establish an industry, or they have got to wait for their turn under the quota, which in some instances means waiting many years.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREE. Yes.

Mr. STOBBS. I am in sympathy with the purposes of the bill, but it seems to me the language in lines 11 and 12, on page 2, "which persons so trained and skilled can not be found unemployed in the United States," goes quite a distance.

Mr. FREE. That has been the language adopted in all bills of this character for many years and there has apparently been no difficulty in showing that to the Secretary of Labor after a proper investigation.

Mr. STOBBS. I can imagine, of course, just as you say, a very highly skilled engineer who is necessary for the purposes of a particular industry in this country and a man that it would be desirable to have come into this country, but you might have engineers unemployed in this country and it is only a question as to the degree of skill. Will the Secretary of Labor construe that in a very broad way?

Mr. FREE. He will construe it in a very limited way, as he has in the past.

May I illustrate how this is done? I have a letter here from a concern that wanted to bring in a man for the potter industry, and in order to establish the fact there were no men who could be so employed in the United States they were compelled to show that they had advertised in all the journals that concerned pottery and that they had advertised in certain other papers throughout the United States where it was possible to get such help.

They have got to make a definite showing that there are no people available for the work in the United States. The character of the work itself for which these people are wanted is such that this is quite apparent. For instance, right now, in my own State, the farmers would like to establish a silk-worm industry. The Japanese have been very proficient in this, but they can not be brought in. Italians could be used for this, but under the quota law they can not be brought in for some time.

Mr. STOBBS. So it is not a question of the degree of skill, it is a question of whether all the men in that particular industry are employed here?

Mr. FREE. Yes.

Mr. STOBBS. So it would not take care of the case of a skilled and efficient engineer from abroad whom certain industries in this country would like to employ here?

Mr. FREE. No. The fundamental proposition is that you have got to show that no labor of like kind is available in the United States.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FREE. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. I might say in further answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the language employed here is the same language employed in similar paragraphs of other laws.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield further at this point?

Mr. FREE. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Is it not true in the case that the gentleman from Massachusetts cites that the party might come here as a visitor and, after having remained here for six months under a proper bond and proper application, he might have that leave extended, and even then it might be extended beyond that time, but his residence could not become permanent?

Mr. FREE. He could not become a permanent resident, and after a certain length of time he would have to leave. Such a man clearly would have to come in under the quota.

Mr. KETCHAM. In the case of a particularly highly trained man?

Mr. FREE. No matter how highly trained he might be. Under this law that is proposed and under the other laws that we have on our statute books it does not make any difference how highly trained the man is, if there are other men available in the United States to do that particular kind of work such a man must come in under the quota.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FREE. Yes.

Mr. STOBBS. Does not the gentleman think that the phraseology of the bill is narrow?

Mr. FREE. I get the gentleman's point.

Mr. STOBBS. There are certain men of outstanding ability in a particular line of industry and it is desirable to get these men into this country to help industry here. The particular man in question may be an engineer. There are thousands of engineers in this country, but this may be the one man that this manufacturing concern in this country wants, and he is going to do more for a particular industry in this country than anyone else could do, but he can not come in under this proposed law.

Mr. FREE. Answering the gentleman's question personally and not for the committee, I would prefer, coming under the quota, to have people of the type the gentleman mentions rather than a lot of people who are coming in under quota. If we could have some sort of selective immigration, like this bill contemplates, we would have a better type of immigration than we have had.

Mr. KETCHAM. Do I understand that the exemptions provided for here are within the quota?

Mr. FREE. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. And this would not enlarge the total at all?

Mr. FREE. No.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREE. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. On page 2, beginning in line 15, it speaks of quota immigrants who are skilled in agriculture. In the sheep industry there is a great demand for sheep herders. These men come from the Pyrenees Mountains between Spain and France. They are absolutely unskilled except in the taking care of sheep. I wonder if in the interpretation of skilled agriculturists such men could be brought into this country. These men know how to herd sheep; they are experts in the care of sheep from youth. I may state these men get from $100 to $150 a month and found. They go out with a bunch of 1,500 to 2,000 head of sheep and camp equipment and a burro, and stay out for three, four, five, or six months by themselves, and occasionally a man will bring them a little grub. These men are skilled in this important line of work, and we need a supply of these men from the Pyrenees in the West from time to time. Would it be possible under this provision to obtain these men?

Mr. SABATH. Why do you need them when the sheep and woolgrowers are going broke and obliged to go out of business, according to reports I have received?

Mr. ARENTZ. As long as the sheepmen are receiving 33, 35, and 40 cents a pound for wool and 9 to 16 cents a pound for mutton and lamb I do not think they are going out of business, but will, if given a chance and time, not only increase their herds, improve their stock, but make mutton a more common item of food in our diet.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Speaker, we are going far afield; I can not yield further.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will refer the gentleman from Nevada to the State Department's pamphlet in regard to immigration of agriculturist experts, which will answer all of his questions.

Mr. ARENTZ. That is very kind of the gentleman; but I think it would be well if the gentleman from California would answer the question to a limited degree.

Mr. FREE. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I do not know how the department has ruled on sheep herders, but it would seem to me that a sheep herder is much more a skilled agriculturist than some who come in as preferred agriculturists and then go into the fur business in New York. There is an instance where a man came in as a skilled agriculturist under the bill and then went into the fur business. You understand that the language of this bill has been followed in bills before, and agriculturists have come in under the quota.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am opposed to this bill. I want to make it clear because up to the present time I do not think the bill has been made clear to you. Before I forget the question that the gentleman from California left off talking about—high skilled labor from Spain—let me call the gentleman's attention that Spain's quota is only approximately 100. Under the act of 1924 half of that is taken away for preferences, and that is what I am going to talk about now. This present bill will add another bundle to the wagon that can hardly move. Now, gentlemen, I want you to bear with me, and in order to appreciate these provisions we must understand this particular angle of our immigration laws.

Prior to 1921 we had no quota laws at all. Any man or woman who was physically fit could enter this country. In 1921 you fixed a quota law on the basis of 3 per cent based on the census of 1910. As a result of that quota law there came to this country about 240,000, approximately. In 1924 you made a drastic change in that law, and you have made it a permanent policy, and you adopted in 1924 the 1890 census as a basis. As the result of that, under the present immigration law, if a country has, say, 300, this total quota of 300 will be used as follows: One-half for preferences and one-half to the so-called new blood. What happens under the present preference? A father and mother of an American citizen could come under it—that is, be taken out of the 150 if the quota is 300. The next one you have entitled to a preference is the husband of an American citizen. That is No. 3 preference. The next one you have is for agriculturists and their wives and minor children, and in 1928, under the resolution that we passed, we raised the age limit from 16 to 18 years for children of agriculturists. We have already four classes in one category.

You now have another attachment that you want to place under this bill, and that is the so-called "highly skilled labor." Who wants them in this country; who asked for them? I do not know. I do not find any special hearings in the committee that somebody wanted this kind of labor. Is it somebody in the department or in the committee who wants to get a few in? Why tack on another preference to a loaded wagon that can not carry the present load?

Some one talks about discrimination. Certainly you have discriminated, and you did in 1924 when you passed the so-called permanent immigration law. You simply thrust out the southern and eastern European countries and gave all of the quotas to Germany and Great Britain, because out of a total number of 161,000 quota numbers for all of the countries Great Britain and Germany received 116,000, leaving the balance, the difference between 161,000 and 116,000, or about 45,000, to the rest of the 49 or 50 nations in the world.

What happened then? You came along and because of a tremendous cry the minority of this committee appealed to this House to exempt the father and mother of an American citizen. We could not see why the father and mother of an American citizen should not be permitted to enter this country without a quota, in exemption of any quota, and instead of that you give us a preference. Let me demonstrate to you by way of illustration only. If your father and mother resided in Great Britain or were born in Great Britain you could bring them in under the preference quota within 30 days, but if your father and mother resided in Syria and you were an American citizen, and you wanted your old father and mother in this country, it would take you at least 22 years to bring them into the United States. Certainly you have discriminated, you have separated families, you have destroyed the home. Now you want to tack another preference onto this same section. You are putting another load on the wagon that can hardly move. You are putting on a fixed preference. What does this bill say? The consul can turn around and push your father and mother aside and take up the so-called "highly skilled labor." In other words, as the matter stands to-day, it takes on an average of at least four to eight years before you can bring in your father and mother from certain countries, and from some countries it will take about 40 years before you can bring them in under the preference that Congress has given the American citizen for his aged father and mother. You now propose to make it about 100 years before you can get them in.

I am opposed to this bill because, in the first place, the demand is not so strong for it. I can not find any hearings or any individual or any corporation or syndicate or business community that wants this kind of legislation. It was proposed in the committee by my good friend Mr. FREE. Who wants it, I do not know; but I do not care who wants it; if you want these people in here, add a few more numbers to the quota, put them under a separate clause, but for God's sake do not add any more preferences, because you have six or eight now that we can not accommodate, under which we can not bring the families together. They are separated because Congress in the act of 1924 said they should be separated under that law.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. If this bill becomes a law, will it not discourage American technicians from qualifying themselves to fill these places that these foreign born will be admitted to fill? In other words, is there not a discrimination against the American technician or mechanic, and does it not discourage him from qualifying himself for these positions?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. There is no question about that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman know the attitude of the American Federation of Labor on this bill?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No one appeared before the committee of any account to ask for this legislation, because under the present law if I have a highly skilled person that I want to bring into the United States for the purpose of carrying out a certain plan, beginning a certain mill, for example, I apply to the Secretary of Labor and he comes right in, and he can stay here as long as it is necessary. So, why turn around and take him out of that clause and attach him to another clause as appears on page 2 of this bill?

May I call your particular attention to the language used in paragraph 1, on page 2 of the proposed bill, H. R. 16926, which reads as follows:

(1) Fifty per cent of the quota of each nationality for such year shall be made available in such year for the issuance of immigration visas to the following classes of immigrants, without priority of preference as between such classes.

It can be seen, therefore, from a reading of this bill that there is no priority between any of the preferences that now exist under the present law, which will continue by this bill with an additional clause.

From a reading of the language of the bill on the same page you will find that the Secretary of Labor, upon the application of any person interested, and after full hearing and investigation of the facts in the case, has the power to determine what is necessary and so advise the Secretary of State, who in turn will communicate with the respective consuls.

What will be the result, other than brushing aside the husband of an American citizen, the father and mother of an American citizen, as well as uniting the families, under the resolution passed in 1928, and the other preferences on the statute books, which are greatly overburdened.

In other words, the consul can accept the recommendation when he receives it from the Secretary of State for special kind of labor, which we can very easily obtain right here in the United States, and discriminate against all other classes who have been waiting for years to be certified for preference, which classes at the present time are more than full.

Now, I will ask gentlemen to be patient and let us see what this bill says. The bill talks about referring to sections of the immigration law of 1924 and then talks about the resolution we passed May 29, 1928. Now, then, we come along to page 2, and we see what? That the following preferences shall be made to the following persons: (a) Quota immigrants——

Mr. FREE. If the gentleman will permit, only 50 per cent of the quota is taken up by preferences.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SABATH. I yield the gentleman another five minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman make his question clear?

Mr. FREE. Is it not a fact that these preferences only apply to 50 per cent of the quota?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Certainly; and that is the more reason why you should not attach any preferences to a bill which is so overloaded with preferences. Think of the fathers and mothers who have not seen their sons, most of whom fought in the World War! Take your bill as an illustration. Say, a country that has 100 numbers, 50 per cent of it is taken up with preferences. Assuming 51 men had mothers or fathers over there. In this bill, which you want Congress to pass, first you say that preference shall be given to fathers and mothers. The next one is husbands of an American citizen. That is, an American woman who marries a foreign husband. We appealed to Congress a year ago to place these husbands in the exempted class and we did not do it. Now, we turn to No. 3. Then you bring in the preference of the quota immigrant who is trained and skilled in a particular art, class, technique, business, or science. Good God, gentlemen, those four different classes every year of skilled persons might apply under this preference. And then, in addition to that, you are bringing in also the wives and minor children of the person who is coming in here as being skilled in a particular art, class, technique, business, or science. In other words, you give a preference in here to any man who brings a wife and probably three or four children, and that is to be taken out of the 50 per cent. The next one is the farmer—the agriculturist.

Under the present bill he has a preference. Now, you want to stick in No. 6 and say highly skilled artists. How many people could come in and claim to be artists for the purpose of getting the benefit under this bill? How many, many tears will be shed by fathers and mothers because there is another preference in the law and they are being put aside? Do not forget that we have already placed in the preferred class of 50 per cent the wives and minor unmarried children under 21 of aliens permanently admitted to the United States under our resolution of May 29, 1928.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is there any limitation in the law as it stands or in this measure upon the power of the Department of Labor to allocate the various classes among those that are in the preferential category?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. You mean can the Secretary of Labor check up on this preferential list?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes. Is there anything in the law under which he can do that?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They might indicate a preference for this so-called kind of skilled labor.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman has not answered my question. Is there anything in the law either as it stands or as is proposed that limits the Department of Labor or prevents it from letting in all or any one of the preference classes to the exclusion of the parents and the exclusion of the children?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They can pick out under the so-called reason or excuse to the detriment of the mother and the father.

Mr. GRIFFIN. In other words, they could take out all those engaged in agricultural pursuits?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. FREE. Now all mothers and fathers who have made applications are considered for priority in the order of treatment.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is not so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I can give the committee a specific case. It is the case of a young man who was born in Syria. His father was killed there. He has not seen his mother for 15 years. They are only behind 40 years in the list of applications already filed. Now, what has happened?

Mr. FREE. These people, I believe, would be farther down the list than that. They would not displace mothers and fathers.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. There is no difference between preference No. 1 and preference No. 2. The law permits the consul to issue visas "without priority of preference," as the law says.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The figures I have here as to the quota of Syria is 100,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It would take 80 years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The number estimated in the demand is 47,000.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I wish to correct the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. I do not like to do it when the gentleman is wrong. The number of Syrians is 47,000. The applications pending are only 4,000. The gentleman has multiplied it by 10.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is right about the 47,000, but the estimate is right also. Those are the pending applications.

Mr. SABATH. Those are the pending applications now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman has not answered me the question I propounded.

Mr. SABATH. That is the estimated demand.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If it is so important that somebody in the United States wants this particular kind of labor that we can not get in the United States; if it is so important and vital to pass special acts, why not turn around and select the number to be used for that purpose? We know the quota is overburdened now. Why turn around and put something else in it?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What information or data was before the committee showing that a particular class was called valuable?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If you have somebody on the other side of the House who will say, "You are all right," you do not have to have a hearing.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not long ago a number of people said to be expert in making glass eyes were brought in from Belgium. After they were here and had the jobs the attention of the department was called to them.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. There is not a European who can come in and say he knows more than our Americans. The trouble is we find some excuse to bring in somebody somewhere under some pretense.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is to get cheaper labor.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is one of the excuses.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. Is it not the purpose to make these alien people who come here the best Americans?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. My purpose would be to select our best people and unite the families; and until we do so we can not class ourselves in that category.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FREE].

Mr. FREE. The question has been brought up as to the demand for this legislation. I read from the letter of the Secretary of Labor dated February 1, 1929, in which he says:

> The proposal above outlined is particularly interesting to this department for the reason that during the past four years a good many cases have arisen in which it clearly appeared that the immigration of a limited number of highly skilled laborers, inventors, engineers, chemists, and other persons possessing peculiar qualifications along some specialized line were actually needed in American industry, but they could not be brought in without considerable delay because they were subject to the quota of the country of their birth.

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FREE. In a moment. But before doing that I want to make this further statement, that under the practice all of these applications are listed in the order in which they are made, and if this bill is passed it will not shut out any mother or any father or relative provided they have in the last two years done what they should have done, namely, notified the Secretary of State through our consuls that they wanted to come here. The State Department has taken up their applications in their order. All these applications are taken up in the order in which they are made.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. STOBBS. I am in favor of this legislation, but the trouble is it does not allow skilled chemists or skilled engineers to come in, because before they can be allowed to come in under this law the Secretary of Labor must find as a fact that there are no skilled chemists or skilled engineers unemployed in this country. That is a perfectly ridiculous proposition, so as a result this legislation does not help in one single instance in allowing skilled chemists or skilled engineers to come in, of the type we want to get into this country. All this legislation accomplishes is simply this: That if you have a new industry in this country and no people in this country skilled enough to perform the work of that new industry, then you can go ahead and get in new people to do that work.

Mr. FREE. That is not correct, and let me illustrate it to you.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. FREE. Several papers, like the New York Times, the San Francisco Chronicle, and several others, have been putting out these rotogravure sections you have seen. They have some labor here to do that, but they have not enough labor to do it, and they want to bring in other people. They can make the showing that the industry is here, and they can make the showing that they can not get enough of these experts to carry on the industry. Let me give you another illustration. I have here a letter from an industry located at Lime Rock, Conn., which is engaged in making highly specialized paper that is used by the Library of Congress, by the Carnegie Institute, and by the Smithsonian Institution. They are making that paper in limited quantities, but they can not get experts enough here to furnish all the paper that those institutions must have. So I say to the gentleman that it does help some.

Mr. STOBBS. But it does not take care of the skilled engineers and chemists the gentleman referred to in the letter he just read.

Mr. FREE. It takes care of part of them, but not all.

Mr. STOBBS. And we want to get skilled men in this country.

Mr. FREE. I think there is much in what the gentleman says, and it would be well if we could have more of that type come into the country instead of some we are now getting. But this bill goes part of the way, and it will enable us to get the people who are actually needed when it can be shown that such people can not be secured in this country.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and colleagues, I do not see any objection to this proposal to admit skilled professional craftsmen into the country, in fact, I think it is very desirable. There are, doubtless, occasions where the necessities of business might require the importation of particularly skilled labor in certain lines, but if it is a good thing why not be frank about it? Why not put them in the nonquota class? They can not amount to any such number as to imperil our institutions. Skilled men brought in to establish a new industry certainly can not do very much harm or crowd conditions in the labor market. There should be no objection to having skilled men come in to establish an industry, because when once established it will lead to the education and employment of other Americans. So I ask whether the committee has given any consideration to that point; that is, whether or not it might not be well to admit persons in this particular class as nonquota? I am addressing my question particularly to the gentleman from California, who introduced this bill. I am sorry to have to repeat, but I have made this inquiry, whether or not your committee has given any consideration to the wisdom of admitting persons in this very limited class nonquota, and not block up and choke the preference class.

Mr. FREE. When I first introduced the bill I introduced it so that they could come in outside the quota.

Mr. GRIFFIN. And that still is the right way to do it.

Mr. FREE. But the committee thought it ought to be under the quota and the bill was reintroduced bringing them under the quota.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It seems to me the number would not mean more than 50 or 100 men, and the admission of these skilled men in the nonquota class would not, as my colleague from New York has stated, choke up the preferred class. I know that the gentleman from California, in response to a question, has said that it is not going to interfere with the parents, wives, husbands, or children of immigrants who have filed their applications, but there are thousands perhaps who have not filed applications. It will bar them. They are equally entitled to our solicitude.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes, and I desire to ask him a question.

Does the gentleman understand the possibility of choking up the preference list in the countries of small quotas like Greece, Hungary, Rumania, Yugoslavia, and some others of them? Further, countries like Italy, having observed the situation that now exists, are declining to give their passports to those other than the main preferences, namely, fathers, mothers, wives, and children. I think the time will soon come when other countries will follow the example of Italy, and the first step in emigrating being the passport, will give passports to those that can make the classifications. I think that is the answer.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the gentleman consider that as disposing of my suggestion that people in this professional class of highly skilled labor should be admitted nonquota?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think the gentleman will find that the applicants that make this affirmative showing, which is afterwards looked into by the consul abroad, will come from the countries of the larger quotas only. There is no other way to fix it at this time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman from New York yield so that I may ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The chairman of the committee states that some countries will not recognize this preference. If that is so and if any country refuses to give passports to parents or relatives to whom we have given a preference, I think retaliatory measures should be taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is a matter for the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes and will use one minute myself.

The State Department says with respect to a certain country:

> As to Italy, it may be mentioned that the Italian Government is following a strict policy of limiting emigration, and it is quite possible that difficulties would be encountered in bringing in Italians, even though it were possible to do so under American laws.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Are they giving passports to mothers and fathers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and wives of aliens who are here.

Mr. GRIFFIN. In conclusion and summarizing, I want to repeat that the proposal is a good one, but it is a mistake for us to put professional, skilled labor into the already overcrowded preferred class. They ought to be put into the nonquota class and ought to be admitted freely, first, for the reason that they can not amount to a very great number, and for the further reason, if they are brought over here to establish a new industry, they come over as teachers, and this means laying the foundation stone for the education of our own laboring men and increasing the diversity of our industries.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. And this should not only apply to one class but should be given to all classes that need this kind of labor as an exception to the quota and should not be made discriminatory.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is what I have said.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. And should be safeguarded by the Department of Labor.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; the gentleman from California [Mr. FREE] says the admission of this particular class into the preferred category will not block the opportunity of parents, husbands, wives, and children from coming in who have filed their applications, but it will block those who have not filed their applications. The gentleman concedes that. But why should that be done? Why should there be any discrimination whatever?

I think the gentlemen have made a mistake in crowding the skilled craftsmen into the preference class, which of right should be reserved entirely for the families of citizens. I will vote for it, talk for it willingly, if the gentlemen will consent to an amendment to put them in the nonquota class. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself seven minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I fully agree with what has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN], a member of the committee, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN]. I fully recognize the point made by the last speaker, and I have long had that in mind.

I am desirous to be of service to our industries. I am desirous that any new industry in need of experts or highly specialized men that may not be available here should be placed in a position to bring them here. We can not do too much to develop our many industries, and it does frequently happen that we can not secure such labor here.

But as the gentleman from California stated—and I agree with him—we should not make it any harder than it is at the present time, and, therefore, I have favored the bill which he introduced permitting these people to be brought in here but placing them within the quota.

The number is not large, and I feel that this should be done in the interest of America and American industry, and we should permit these people to come in here outside of the quota.

I have the utmost confidence in the Secretary of Labor and in the Commissioner of Immigration that they will not permit anyone to come unless it is proven beyond any doubt that such skilled labor can not be obtained in the United States; and in view of that fact, if we are honest and sincere and wish to be helpful and do not wish to be altogether inhuman, we should adopt as a substitute the bill which the gentleman from California has introduced and favored; and I want to say right here that he is about as good a restrictionist as we have in the House. The gentleman has always believed in extreme restriction, but he recognizes the need of this legislation, and I am willing and I will favor the substitution of the bill which he originally introduced placing all these people outside of the quota for the bill now under consideration.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What do you mean by the designation "quota immigrants who, being trained and skilled in a particular art, craft, technique, business, or science," and so forth?

Mr. SABATH. There are large manufacturers who are establishing their bureaus here, as is stated, who absolutely require men who are familiar with their products to come here and represent them, and to properly introduce the article which they produce and manufacture.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. May I call the gentleman's attention to page 2 of this bill, where it says—

> 50 per cent of the quota of each nationality for such year shall be made available in such year for the issuance of immigration visas to the following classes of immigrants without priority of preference as between such classes.

Is that correct?

Mr. SABATH. I know what the gentleman fears, and I believe there is foundation for the suspicion that the influential manufacturers, the influential men of industry, can secure the approval of the authorities much easier than the poor, unfortunate fellow who served the Nation during the war and can not prevail, perhaps, when he makes application for his father or mother to be placed in the preferential class. I really think there is a foundation for the suspicion, and that such a case may occur.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. I would like to come back to the question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] about the word "business," and the construction of this clause.

Does this mean that the person admitted must be skilled in the business for the purpose of establishing a business in this country, or does it mean that the person may be admitted to be employed in a business, if they can come here as skilled persons?

Mr. SABATH. I think the chairman is in a better position to answer the gentleman's question that is propounded.

Mr. BURTNESS. The word "business" seems to be entirely inconsistent here.

Mr. SABATH. I have explained it to the best of my ability, and I feel that the chairman is in a better position to answer the gentleman than I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FREE].

Mr. FREE Mr. Chairman, I have a statement here from the State Department which I want to read:

> Attention is called to the fact that a very small part of the preference half of the quotas for the above countries has ever been utilized in the past. During the last quota year only 1,326 quota numbers were used for preference relatives and 15,154 for skilled agriculturists in all of the countries of northern and western Europe. This makes a total of but 16,480 out of 70,449 quota numbers available for first-preference aliens in these countries.

In other words, in the large countries the mothers and fathers and other relatives are not using up the preferences allowed them at the present time. While the gentleman from New York has picked out Syria, which has a small quota, where many people wanted to come in, yet as a matter of fact, take it all in all, the preference clauses which include the wives, mothers, and fathers have not been utilized to the extent of the law.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The only persons as mothers and fathers who come in without any difficulty are those from Germany and Great Britain. The rest of the world, having small quotas, are practically barred out. Let me ask the gentleman a question. On page 2 of the bill you allow fathers and mothers to come in under the preference visa. Suppose a skilled mechanician, or craftsman, as you call him, comes to the consul at the same time that a mother comes. Who is the consul going to give the preference to—the mother or the mechanician or craftsman?

Mr. FREE. That would be impossible.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. You say there should be no distinction between classes. Could you not give the preference to the skilled technician as against the father or the mother?

Mr. GREEN. Which would be worth the most to our Government as a citizen—the skilled man or the father or mother?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the introduction of the word "business" in line 10, page 2, it was thought advisable by the State Department, in order to take care of certain possibilities that might arise under treaties under the right of a person to travel without let or hindrance in the country of the other party to the treaty, that word should go in.

Mr. BURTNESS. The question is what the word "business" means in that connection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have explained it that far. The State Department's objection to the bill was that it did not provide for business experts. One man can make his definition of that just as well as another.

Mr. BURTNESS. Is there any country in the world that has as many business experts as the United States has?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Probably not. We probably have so many that we will not receive many from other countries.

Mr. BURTNESS. Therefore the use of the word in this bill would be inapplicable to the practical situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I doubt if it will be needed at all, except that it seems necessary to offer treaty protection. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of section 6 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended by the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution relating to the immigration of certain relatives of United States citizens and of aliens lawfully admitted to the United States," approved May 29, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 1009), is amended to read as follows:

"(1) Fifty per cent of the quota of each nationality for such year shall be made available in such year for the issuance of immigration visas to the following classes of immigrants, without priority of preference as between such classes: (A) Quota immigrants who are the fathers or the mothers, or the husbands by marriage occurring after May 31, 1928, of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over; (B) quota immigrants who, being trained and skilled in a particular art, craft, technique, business, or science, are needed by bona fide employers to engage in work to perform which persons so trained and skilled can not be found unemployed in the United States, and the wives, and the dependent children under the age of 21 years, of such immigrants, if accompanying or following to join them; and (C) in the case of any nationality the quota for which is 300 or more, quota immigrants who are skilled in agriculture, and the wives, and the dependent children under the age of 21 years, of such immigrants skilled in agriculture, if accompanying or following to join them. Preference under clause (B) of this paragraph shall not be given to any alien claiming to be so trained and skilled unless the Secretary of Labor, upon the application of any person interested and after full hearing and investigation of the facts in the case, determines that a bona fide employer needs persons so trained and skilled and that such persons can not be found unemployed in the United States. The determination of the Secretary of Labor shall be transmitted to the consular officer through the Secretary of State. Such determination of the Secretary of Labor shall also be considered for the purposes of the fourth proviso of section 3 of the immigration act of 1917, as his determination of the necessity for importing such skilled labor."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SABATH: Strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 4 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, is amended by striking out the word "or" at the end of subdivision (e) and by striking out the period at the end of subdivision (f) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "or" and by adding after subdivision (f) a new subdivision to read as follows:

"(g) If or when a person of like qualifications unemployed can not be found in the United States, an immigrant who, being trained and skilled in a particular art, craft, technique, or science seeks to enter the United States solely to engage in the invention, development, perfection, or operation of such an art, craft, technique, or science, or of a mechanical, electrical, or chemical process, as an employee of an American person or corporation."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane. This bill proposes to grant preferences within quotas, while the proposed amendment grants preferences beyond the quotas.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I am offering it as a substitute.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the House is a bill amending paragraph 1 of section 6 of the immigration act of 1924. The substitute offered by the gentleman amends the very same provision of the act, and offering it as a substitute clearly brings it within the ruling on the Aswell amendment to the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. GREEN. But the gentleman seeks to amend it in an entirely different way.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, my substitute provides for the same thing that the bill does, with this one exception. My amendment provides that these men should be permitted to come outside of the quota, and the pending bill provides that they shall come within the quota. That is the only difference between my substitute and the pending bill. For that reason I feel that it is in order.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, for that reason our contention is that the substitute is not in order, because it brings in an entirely different proposition. The bill before the committee has for its main purpose preventing the bringing in outside of the quota additional aliens.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The substitute is an amendment to section 4, and the bill amends section 6 of the immigration act of 1924.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will it be in order then to offer that as an amendment to the bill if it is not in order to offer it as a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SABATH. What will be in order and what is permissible under the ruling?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 2, line 15, after the semicolon, strike out all the remainder of line 15, and all of lines 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, on page 2.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, my amendment strikes out the provision for immigrants skilled in agriculture. I do not believe there is any more need for skilled agriculturalists in this country. I think we have too many of them now. I am sure that the chairman of the committee will state that this provision of the law has not been used to any great extent since 1924, when we enacted it. What few individual cases have come in under this provision I say now came in under a subterfuge. There is no doubt about that. I have seen applications and attempts made to bring in skilled agriculturalists to the cities. If we strike this out, I think we will eliminate one source of abuse in encumbering the now limited number of immigrants preferred under the law, thereby facilitating and expediting the entry of parents of American citizens. Unless the committee has information that this provision of law has been used and properly used and is needed, I do not see why we should not strike it out at this time. It will lighten the work of applications made to consuls under this provision of law by people who are not entitled to come in and who can not qualify, and I think we will compensate what you are now inserting under provision (b), the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. FREE]. I have not heard of a single individual case, a meritorious case, that has qualified under the so-called skilled agriculturalists provision of law.

And that being so, it should not be here, because it permits them to go into the preferential class and take the place of a bona fide preferential immigrant.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The proposal, about as offered by the gentleman from New York, has been given careful attention in the committee, but owing to the fact of the short time between now and the adjournment of the Congress, it was thought best not further to confuse the matter by striking the farmer preference out of the first one-half quotas.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has it served a useful purpose up to date?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, the farmer preference available in the first four months of the fiscal year show the countries of northern and western Europe 5,000 and the other 1,042.

Mr. IRWIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. IRWIN. Is there any law at the present time in reference to expert agriculturists coming over to this country and going to work on a farm and in two or three months they become disgusted—as I say, is there any law prohibiting their going to the towns and taking work in the towns instead of agricultural work?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, that is very slight.

Mr. IRWIN. There is no prohibition?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No.

Mr. IRWIN. So if one is an expert agriculturist, he gets tired of the farm in two or three weeks, he could go to the town and obtain employment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There is no way in the United States to compel him to stay on the farm and work if he can find a job elsewhere and wants to go into a foundry or factory.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. DICKSTEIN) there were—ayes 15, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Section 1 of this act shall take effect July 1, 1929, except that the determinations thereunder by the Secretary of Labor may be made at any time after the enactment of this act.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and colleagues, I dislike to take up so much of your time on this comparatively unimportant amendment to the immigration law, and I would not except that it has a sentimental and a moral side to it. Let me call your attention specifically to the language in lines 4 and 5 of the bill on page 2, which reads:

Fifty per cent of the quota of each nationality for such year shall be made available in such year for the issuance of immigration visas to the following classes of immigrants, without priority of preference as between such classes.

In other words it not only puts the skilled technicians and specialists in business in the preferential class along with the parents, wives, and children of American citizens but forbids priority being extended to the members of a citizen's family. I do not think that is fair or just, and I do not think this Congress, if it gives a moment of reflection and deliberation to it, will consent to it. This amendment seems to me to be dictated perhaps by some special interests in the country which want to get some particular kind of technicians to build up their business, and may not, perhaps, involve the immigration of more than a dozen or more of such workmen. But as little distance as it goes it inevitably involves the exclusion of parents, husbands, wives, and children of American citizens who are here. Going that far is going too far. It is radically wrong.

In my experience since the World War closed I have had scores of boys who fought in the war, who carried our flag on the other side and fought in the trenches, who were not able to get their parents here for years. I told this House two years ago of an instance where one of our alien soldier boys, after four years of struggle, finally got permission to bring his mother here, but the permission came so late that it was her dead body that was finally delivered to him at Ellis Island.

Such discriminations are barbarous and unjust. If they have fought our battles and if they are good enough to be American citizens, they ought to be good enough to have their fathers and mothers enter our land in the nonquota class. At least we should not put up this additional barrier to further minimize their chances of entering our frontiers. The Department of Labor has no restrictions whatever upon its discretion. The Secretary of Labor may take and allocate the whole of a country's preference quota to the agricultural employments or to the skilled craftsmen who are provided for in this bill.

The gentleman from California [Mr. FREE] had the right idea when he originally framed his bill in putting the skilled craftsman in the nonpreference or nonquota class. The substance of it was offered by my friend and colleague from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] as an amendment to this bill, but was held out of order. The gentleman from California has the right idea, and he ought to have the courage to stand and fight for it and not consent to an emasculation of his well thought out bill.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Does not this bill from start to finish camouflage and conceal the purpose of the bill, which will permit technicians in one or two industries to enjoy its benefits?

Mr. GRIFFIN. All that I know is that there are certain people who want to get a few men in here under color of this amendment, and that is enough to damn it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment: Page 3, line 10, strike out the comma and insert a period and strike out the balance of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 3, line 10, after the figures "1929," insert a period and strike out the balance of the section.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the cat will be out of the bag in a very few minutes. If it is the intention to have the new preferred class to take their places after the applications of parents of citizens now pending, then there is no necessity for the provision that the Secretary of Labor may pass upon these applications and have them all ready before July 1, 1929. This indicates, as my colleague from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] just pointed out, that something has been prepared and set to bring in individuals, not because they can not find the same class of skilled labor in the United States but because they want cheaper labor, and they want to bring them in here at once.

The bill puts in the amendment of the law a provision, so as not to lose any time, to the effect that immediately and before July 1, 1929, the Secretary of Labor may determine whether they need these skilled laborers or not; and if so, give them the necessary permit to come in.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does not the gentleman agree to that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The quotas are prepared four months before that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will put into effect the provisions of this bill on July 1, 1929, and stop right there, it will give at least four months' start to the fathers and mothers who are now waiting and who want to apply for preferential visas. I want to state to the gentleman from Washington, who prides himself on his regularity, that the President of the United States in four or five successive messages to Congress recommended that we humanize the law so as to permit families to be united as soon as possible, and that President-elect Hoover, in his speech of acceptance, went on record as being in favor of amending the immigration law so as to humanize it and permit fathers and mothers of citizens to come in. Now we find that you not only inject a new class to cut down the number of fathers and mothers, but you come in and destroy the advantage they should have by permitting the Secretary of Labor to determine ahead of the time the law goes into effect. Then you come in and pretend that you restrict immigration, while you really open the doors to a cheaper kind of foreign labor.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Is it not expected that the class will be closed up by the preferences already listed?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is closely figured that by the time the papers will arrive on the other side this new amendment will become operative to take the place of mothers and fathers.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The mothers and fathers who wanted the preference would go to the American consul, while these other people will not have to go there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They can even bring in a stenographer under this bill and anyone in business.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. The gentleman is not in favor of repealing the quota law, is he?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am in favor of repealing the discriminatory features of the quota law.

Mr. GREEN. Does not the gentleman know that if we do not include this class within the quota that they will continue to pound at the doors and try to get in without the quota?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee automatically rises.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ACKERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16926) granting preference within the quota to certain aliens trained and skilled in a particular art, craft, technique, business, or science, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Immigration.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DICKSTEIN moves to recommit this bill to the Committee on Immigration.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to recommit the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DICKSTEIN) there were—ayes 20, noes 96.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 42, nays 280, not voting, 106, as follows:

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE RETIREMENT AND RECLASSIFICATION BILLS

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I feel it of the utmost importance to call to the attention of the House at this time the necessity for passing the Dale-Lehlbach retirement bill. I have aided in securing a rule for consideration of this measure, which rule has been in the possession of the chairman of the Rules Committee for quite a while.

This act increases the maximum retirement pay to $1,200 a year and the average allowance to $800. The present maximum is $1,000, and the average pay around $700. And in many cases employees receive less than $100 yearly.

This fund comes largely out of the salaries of the employees—in fact, practically all of it. So, why should Congress object to passing a meritorious measure, which means the caring for aged employees of the Federal Government, when it comes out of their own pockets?

The session is approaching its close. There is no question that if this bill should be placed before the House at the present time it would pass by a vote of three-fourths of the membership.

I also wish to draw attention of the Members of the House to the reclassification act, passed by the Senate, known as the Brookhart bill and introduced in the House by Mr. CELLER, of New York.

And I will further bring to the attention of the Members of the House the fact that under the Welch bill, as administered by the Personnel Classification Board, from my personal knowledge and through information gained in discussing the matter with employees here, in my home city of El Paso, and elsewhere, that the ones receiving the lower pay have not been benefited.

I do not object, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, to the fact that increases were granted under the Welch Act. I think this was very necessary and timely. But I do wish to impress upon you the fact that those in the lower grades, who I thought at the time of the passage of the act, would receive substantial increases, have not received them under the classification made by this board.

Furthermore, the Comptroller General construes this act in a different way from what Congress intended. And those whom we intended should get the real benefit, or a majority of the Federal employes, I might say, have not received it, as the act has been construed and administered.

Everyone recognizes at the present time the great increase in the cost of living. And since I have been a Member of Congress there has been at least 100 per cent increase in the cost of living. But the increase in salaries has not been commensurate with, by any means, or in proportion to the increase in the necessaries of life.

"The laborer is worthy of his hire." The Federal Government is a big corporation, and it has as faithful employees as we have in this great country. Therefore I especially urge that these bills be taken up at the earliest possible moment and placed before the House, where there is no question they will pass by a large majority.

I especially urge the Republican steering committee and the chairman of the Rules Committee, who have the power to bring these measures up and permit the Members who earnestly desire to have these increases made, to give them opportunity to vote upon them, so that they may be enacted at the other end of the Capitol and reach the President in time for his signature before the final adjournment on the 4th of March.

I recently signed a request for the bringing up of these measures and am informed by the gentlemen who circulated this petition that over 300 names of Members of the House had been secured requesting immediate consideration. This shows the temper of the House and should convince the "powers that be" of the great importance of considering this legislation at the earliest possible time. [Applause.]

DEPORTATION OF ALIENS

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 5094) making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 5094, with Mr. BACON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this bill is an abridgement of a bill relating to deportation which passed the House almost unanimously in the last Congress and in the Congress before that. The bill in much larger form was reported from the committee to this House a year ago in January, but the time now is so short between now and adjournment it has been decided by the committee to report out a deportation bill in shorter form.

The committee has given the bill, in case it becomes a law, a title so that the act may be known as the undesirable aliens act of 1929.

The bill has been written with the greatest care, without malice or feeling of any kind, and is designed for the protection of the United States, and is intended to reach only the most dangerous classes of criminals and those aliens who smuggle or who assist in smuggling other aliens into the United States. This is the bill you have all been asking for. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In just a minute. Wait until I have finished my statement.

The committee spent some time in endeavoring to draft a paragraph that would reach the alien gunman, and at a meeting of the committee this morning the reporting of an amendment including one more classification was authorized, reading as follows:

(8) An alien who is convicted of carrying on or about the person, transporting, or possessing any weapon or explosive bomb, for which he is sentenced to imprisonment for a term of six months or more; or who, having been convicted of carrying on or about the person, transporting, or possessing any weapon or explosive bomb, is thereafter convicted of carrying on or about the person, transporting, or possessing any weapon or explosive bomb, regardless of the sentence in either case. This subsection shall apply only in the case of offenses committed after the enactment of this act.

In other words, in respect of this line of cases the committee, if we can enact this into law, reaches down to less than one year's conviction and recognizes a conviction of six months in a court of record, or two convictions of the same person regardless of the length of time.

Quite a number of the States have very stringent laws against the carrying of guns. Most of them require permits, and several States have laws with regard to the carrying of guns by aliens, and in some States aliens are required also to have permits.

I am hopeful we can get right along with the bill. It has been abridged to the last degree and will be effective, and now includes this additional provision.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Wait until I have rounded out my statement.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield with respect to the language describing the bomb?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I just read it. We can not describe bombs and hatchets and the size of bombs, and all that sort of thing, in respect of the enactment of a bill to apply to persons who have been convicted. We use the words "explosive bombs." The courts will take care of the description according to State laws.

This language is the key to the bill:

That the following aliens shall, upon warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported in the manner provided in sections 19 and 20 of the immigration act of 1917 (U. S. C. title 8, secs.

155, 156), if the Secretary of Labor, after hearing, finds that such aliens are undesirable residents of the United States.

Now, gentlemen must understand that sections 19 and 20 of the basic immigration act of 1917 still stand, providing for deportation, and that every alien may have a lawyer and have a defense. That applies to two or three classes now—the procurer type and one or two others. This bill extends it to the narcotic type, the narcotic peddler, and also to those who would smuggle and harbor aliens. I think that makes it clear. They have the process and opportunity of defense, and in addition I want to say that all cases of deportation not mentioned in this particular act remain in the law of 1917.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I regard this as a very meritorious bill. It has already passed the Senate, I believe?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Part of the text of the bill has passed the Senate, but we have substituted a deportation bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I wondered if this amendment was adopted it would not jeopardize the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think not; this Senate proposal really related to aliens deported and returning to the United States. I think that we can get something out of this that the people want.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman state why we can not make this retroactive?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have a doubt as to the policy of making laws retroactive.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If we could go back to January 1 and catch that bunch that did the shooting the other day in Chicago——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am not sure they are all aliens.

In regard to a retroactive clause, it is interesting to note that many of the provisions in the large deportation bill were brought out a year ago in the past. Yet some of the cases provided for deportation exist now only in a small degree. You must remember that there was a time limit—five years in most cases and three years in some. There was no limit to some of the worst criminals. When your committee undertook five years ago to work out a deportation law there were a great many dependent aliens in insane institutions—decrepit and paupers. The law was not passed and so time limit ran in nearly all of the cases. The restrictive immigration act went into effect on July 1, 1924, so it will be five years next July, and on July 1 next the time limit will run out in nearly all classes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. My attention was called to the cases of four aliens ordered deported confined in an institution in St. Louis where the State Department was unable to secure from the foreign government their passports. How are you going to get such people deported if the foreign government will not issue the passports?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We have the same trouble in the United States, for we as a government decline to take back our insane aliens from Canada.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Then what is the use of passing this bill if the foreign governments will not grant the passports?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This reaches another type entirely.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am pleased to be in a position to say that it begins to look as if I have been of some service to the House and to the country. I say this because I recall that when some four years ago the House was about to pass a deportation bill I called attention to the fact that it contained many glaring defects. I pointed out here at that time that some of its provisions were most unfortunate, unfair, and utterly indefensible. That I was justified in my criticism was demonstrated later by the refusal of the Senate to enact it into law.

Again, a year ago, the House passed a deportation bill, not as fierce, not quite as bad, as the one we passed in 1926, but still a very vicious bill which again failed, and properly so, to pass the Senate.

Therefore, I am indeed pleased that to-day the committee submits for your consideration a deportation bill which is not as vicious, which is not as bad, and which I am hopeful that I may be able to vote for, and will vote for, if a few amendments are agreed to, and which amendments I feel that you gentlemen will vote for when they are submitted to the House.

Now, with a view of enlightening some of you gentlemen who have been made to believe that in years gone by we have had no deportation legislation, I want to read to you, while I have a chance, what the present law provides.

I desire to do this so that in the future you will not be carried away on legislation that is brought up on the floor of the House merely because some unreasonable people insist upon its enactment. I know that most of you, due to the large amount of work you have, and the many duties which you must perform, are unable to familiarize yourselves with all of the laws. Therefore, at this time I shall read what the present deportation law actually is. Section 19 provides:

SEC. 19. That at any time within five years after entry, any alien who at the time of entry was a member of one or more of the classes excluded by law; any alien who shall have entered or who shall be found in the United States in violation of this act, or in violation of any other law of the United States; any alien who at any time after entry shall be found advocating or teaching the unlawful destruction of property, or advocating or teaching anarchy, or the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law or the assassination of public officials; any alien who within five years after entry becomes a public charge from causes not affirmatively shown to have arisen subsequent to landing; except as hereinafter provided, any alien who is hereafter sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime involving moral turpitude, committed within five years after the entry of the alien to the United States, or who is hereafter sentenced more than once to such a term of imprisonment because of conviction in this country of any crime involving moral turpitude, committed at any time after entry; any alien who shall be found an inmate of or connected with the management of a house of prostitution or practicing prostitution after such alien shall have entered the United States, or who shall receive, share in, or derive benefit from any part of the earnings of any prostitute; any alien who manages or is employed by, in, or in connection with any house of prostitution or music or dance hall or other place of amusement or resort habitually frequented by prostitutes, or where prostitutes gather, or who in any way assists any prostitute or protects or promises to protect from arrest any prostitute; any alien who shall import or attempt to import any person for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; any alien who, after being excluded and deported or arrested and deported as a prostitute, or as a procurer, or as having been connected with the business of prostitution or importation for prostitution or other immoral purposes in any of the ways hereinbefore specified, shall return to and enter the United States; any alien convicted and imprisoned for a violation of any of the provisions of section four hereof; any alien who was convicted, or who admits the commission, prior to entry, of a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; at any time within three years after entry, any alien who shall have entered the United States by water at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials, or by land at any place other than one designated as a port of entry for aliens by the Commissioner General of Immigration, or at any time not designated by immigration officials, or who enters without inspection, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported.

I have read to you the deportation provision of our law which has been on the statute books for over 10 years, under which to my mind you can deport almost anybody, at least anybody and everybody who is guilty of any crime. But in that law there were limitations as to when deportations must take place in instances of certain offenses. It will be noted that the law now requires that deportation must take place within three or five years in certain instances. That, however, does not apply to the provision that I had written into the law, namely, the deportation of violators of the white-slave traffic, under which they can be deported at any and all times without any limitation of time. The bills that the committee reported, and the House voted for, at the last session and the session before last, merely recited the present laws and eliminated the limitations that are placed in it, in respect to some of the offenses mentioned in the 1917 act. Therefore, as I say, I am mighty pleased to-day to know that the committee has finally, after sobering up and giving the matter due consideration, submitted a report and recommended a bill which is not as harsh, not as unreasonable, as those bills which you gentlemen have twice voted for almost unanimously in this House, due to the fact that you did not have the information that you should have had before voting on such important legislation.

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of California. Will the gentleman point out to us the difference between the old deportation law and this bill under consideration?

Mr. SABATH. I do not think that I have the time, but I will say that this bill eliminates the time limit in certain offenses, so that under this law—and that is one of the objections I still have—a man may be deported for a minor offense—yes, even for misdemeanors committed 20 or 30 years ago. The gentleman, I take it, is a lawyer; and he knows that in every State in the Union we have a statute of limitation which runs, in most of States, three years, and in some of them five years, which is the time limit within which a man guilty of an offense, even a crime, can be prosecuted. But in this bill we completely eliminate that time limit, and a man might be deported, as I stated, 10, yes, 20, years after the offense has been committed. That provision in relation to some minor offenses is, I think, cruel, un-American, unwise, and unjustifiable, and I feel it should be amended. I favor the deportation of a real criminal at any and all times, but not one guilty of only a minor infraction of law.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. The gentleman stated a moment ago that the committee had sobered. Does the gentleman wish to leave the impression that it was drunk on power?

Mr. SABATH. I know that the gentlemen of my committee do not get drunk on anything else than power. Of course, I am not at all times with them, and I do not know whether they imbibe anything other than the power that has been granted to them as members of that committee. I certainly do not wish to leave any inference that the committee, or any member of it, has been drunk on anything other than power. Proviso 3 and proviso 4 in this bill, I think, should be amended. I hope you gentlemen who are here will realize that I am not seeking anything beyond fairness and justice, that I favor deportation, and that I always did, of any criminal and, again, I am obliged to congratulate myself and pat myself on the back because the committee has finally agreed with me and has brought in a provision under which we will be able to deport the criminal gunman. In the acts of 1925 and 1926, and in the last year's act, that provision was not in the deportation bill. I then introduced a bill which provided directly for the summary deportation of gunmen. I have no sympathy, and never did have any, with any real criminal, but I do have sympathy for an unfortunate alien who, through no fault of his, finds himself an inmate in an institution, such as a hospital or public sanitarium, where he has been sent because of injury that he has received through no fault of his own, and who, because of that fact, when found to be receiving treatment in such an institution is designated a public charge, though he did nothing to bring it upon himself, and under our laws is ordered deported because he has not enough funds to be taken care of or treated in a private hospital or sanitarium. I have always favored the deportation of every real criminal.

I have no sympathy with those who deliberately come here in violation of the law, trusting to outwit our officials, and I repeat that they should be deported. Therefore, I hope to-day to be able to support a deportation bill even though it may go a little further than I think it should, providing it may contain provisions which I feel of interest to our Nation. I say, I am hopeful that I may be able to vote for it, providing, however, you will help me to justify my vote for it by eliminating some few unjustifiable provisions which are both unreasonable and unconstitutional.

In addition to the amendment which I offer, I have another amendment which I desire to offer and will offer when the proper time comes, and that provides for the deportation of anyone, not only the gunman convicted in court of record, but I will go with the committee a step farther. I believe we should deport every gunman after he has been found guilty the second time of having in his possession any gun, pistol, revolver, or explosive bomb. It should not be necessary that he should be convicted in a court of record, but it should suffice that he has been convicted in any court. I repeat that I am not, never was, and never will be in favor of anything helpful to any alien criminal. I am against them; I want them out. I want the alien here to behave himself and demonstrate that he is deserving of our hospitality. On the other hand, gentlemen, I want to ask of you that in the future when this question comes up do not look upon this question as involving principally the alien, but as having reference chiefly to the criminal.

The number of the criminal aliens is small, indeed, in comparison; the percentage is much lower in fact than that among American-born or American citizens.

These gunmen that you read about are not aliens. They are not men who came here in the last 5, 8, 10, or 15 years and of the so-called new immigration. A majority are men who are born in this country; some are of foreign parentage.

A large number of men who are studying the present crime wave believe that the late war is responsible for the prevalent crime.

The war undoubtedly taught men to hold human life cheap; it imbued men with the killing instinct. Civilization is going to have to pay the price for a certain period, until this killing instinct subsides.

However, anyone who has studied the conditions can not deny that prohibition, to a far greater extent than the war, is responsible for the present wave of crime.

In this I am borne out by every man and woman, and every organization that has investigated and studied conditions. Therefore, gentlemen, the sooner we modify or change the present prohibition law the sooner we will be able to reduce, and I hope, eliminate a great measure of the existing deplorable conditions. Such action, and such action alone, in my judgment, will tend to arrest the ever-increasing disregard of every other law. Prohibition has been responsible for more crime than anything else that has occurred in America in a century.

Therefore I am indeed grateful that the committee has agreed to embody in this bill an amendment which will bring about summary deportation of any alien guilty of carrying concealed weapons. I concede it is a very stringent provision, but I feel it is absolutely necessary, not because it will bring about any great number of aliens for this offense, but it will prove beyond doubt that only a very few, if any, of these gunmen are aliens, which will be demonstrated within a short space of time after this provision goes into effect and will stop the continuous attacks of those who are trying to unload all the blame for all crime on the shoulders of the immigrant classes.

The amendment referred to which I shall offer at the proper time and which I hope will be adopted, reads as follows:

(8) An alien who is convicted of carrying on or about the person, transporting, or possessing any weapon or explosive bomb, for which he is sentenced to imprisonment for a term of six months or more; or who, having been convicted of carrying on or about the person, transporting, or possessing any weapon or explosive bomb, is thereafter convicted of carrying on or about the person, transporting, or possessing any weapon or explosive bomb, regardless of the sentence in either case. This subsection shall apply only in the case of offenses committed after the enactment of this act.

In this connection, gentlemen of the House, I desire to state that in the following additional amendment I believe I provide a manner of getting at a real solution of this problem of the alien gunman in a more far-reaching and practical way than by any method that has heretofore been suggested here:

an alien who has no lawful and visible means of livelihood, who has been convicted for the second time as a vagrant, if it appears that in each case at the time of his arrest he was carrying on his person or in a vehicle, a concealed pistol, revolver, gun, or bomb.

Mr. GREEN rose.

Mr. SABATH. I had forgotten the gentleman. I am glad——

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I will.

Mr. GREEN. I wonder if the gentleman has the figures showing exactly what percentage of the criminals of the country are aliens and what percentage are Americans?

Mr. SABATH. Well, I will give that information in a minute.

Mr. GREEN. And also give to the House what percentage of our population is foreign born.

Mr. SABATH. I will try to give the gentleman and the House all the information I possibly can within the time allotted to me. I am glad to see the gentleman rise and ask for information for I know he can use a lot of information and the information probably will be beneficial to him I hope in the future. [Laughter.] I do not know of anybody who can absorb more information than the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN. And I do not know of any gentleman who can come as near not giving information as the gentleman. Will the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. SABATH. I shall again prove to you and to the House that you are again wrong in your statement, as I will give you facts and figures that will make you dizzy, and I hope that it will do you some good.

Mr. GREEN. Answer the question.

Mr. SABATH. And be absorbed by you and subsequently utilized in the right direction.

The gentleman from Florida requested information, and I must not disappoint him. I wish to submit some information relative to his own State of Florida. Florida had an estimated population in 1925 of 1,253,957, of which 28,571 are listed by the United States Census Bureau as aliens, and I imagine a very, very small proportion of that number are Europeans and a very large proportion Cubans and from the West Indies.

Florida, being part of the States, is under prohibition along with the rest of us, and the records show the people down there are inclined to violate the prohibition laws very much as they do elsewhere. If the aliens are the only ones violating the Volstead Act, they must be kept pretty busy. The records show that during the year ending June 30, 1928, the number of "distilleries" seized in the State of Florida numbered 820, while of lesser apparatus for violating the prohibition laws, there were confiscated in that State, in addition, 581 individual stills, 850 still worms (whatever they are), and 20,981 "fermenters." So that it is evident that someone down in the gentleman's State does enjoy a drink. I read recently in the newspapers a statement by some public official to the effect that 100 stills are operating in the Nation as a whole for every 1 destroyed, and if this estimate holds good as to Florida it becomes evident that more good "likker" is being produced in the good and great State of Florida than can probably be consumed by the aliens without a little assistance now and then from the balance of the Florida citizenship.

I do not wish to be understood as assailing Florida or Floridans. Not at all. I sympathize with Florida. Not only did she lose in a single year all that valuable paraphernalia for the manufacture of the celebrated Florida "hootch" or "white mule," but her citizens were forced to withstand the agonizing ordeal of standing helplessly by and watching the authorities seize, lay violate hands upon, and destroy 36,596 gallons of the finished product of the still, to say nothing of 1,097,287 gallons of the still unfinished product, otherwise known as "mash." Visualize it, contemplate it, weep over it, you who have hearts, the "makings" of a million grand and glorious feelings heartlessly and ruthlessly wasted!

One more reference as to the prohibition and Florida, and then I intend to let Florida alone. In addition to the output of Florida's distilleries, stills, still worms, and that Florida handy household convenience, the "fermenter," it is said that enough red liquor is smuggled into Florida ports from Cuba and the Bahamas every year to float one of those cruisers of the type recently authorized by Congress.

Adjoining Florida is the "bone-dry" State of Georgia. Georgia in 1925 had an estimated population nearly three times that of Florida, but only one-sixth as many aliens, 4,734 against Florida's 28,571. But—shades of William D. Upshaw—the year ending June 30, 1928, witnessed the destruction of more than twice as many stills, and the seizure of more than twice as much mash, in which so much hope and anticipation is centered, than occurred even in Florida.

To recapitulate, the year's casualties for "bone-dry" Georgia were: 1,919 distilleries, 1,484 stills, 934 still worms, 19,379 fermenters, 33,351 gallons of spirits, 2,456,067 gallons of mash—all gone to smash! And the number of aliens affirmed to be in Georgia was only 4,734 out of its total population of 3,058,260! Only one-sixth as many aliens and more than twice as much law violation? Is further comment necessary?

If the estimate previously cited, of 100 stills operating for each one discovered and seized holds good for Georgia, the "aliens" down there have no need of any worry on our part. They are no doubt still able to get a drink and this notwithstanding the statement on the part of its Representatives.

I have no personal animus whatever in this matter, and am not pretending that Florida or Georgia is any worse or any better or any drier or any wetter than any other State in the Union. As a matter of fact, they are not. I could cite similar figures about most any other State in prohibition America. For the farce is nation-wide.

But since I have been discussing those two States I wish to add, as a mere matter of postscript, a little further data to show which way the wind is blowing in a couple of the leading cities of Florida and Georgia.

Arrests for drunkenness in Jacksonville, Fla., for the year 1921 numbered 995, but for 1927 the number was 3,109 more than three times as many as during 1921.

Arrests for the same cause in Atlanta, Ga., in 1921 numbered 4,491, as against 9,896 in 1927.

Similar statistics could be cited for most cities in the United States, and it is a curious fact that the increase of arrests for drunkenness appears markedly greater in the former so-called dry States than in the former so-called wet States.

Another peculiar fact revealed by the official report of the Commissioner of Prohibition is that some of the States which send the leading dry crusaders to Congress are greater violators of the prohibition law, in proportion to population, than some of the former so-called wet States. Much is said, for instance, about the "wetness" of my own State, Illinois. Now, I frankly admit the prohibition law is violated there, but you seldom hear the Representatives of the "dry" States doing likewise. Yet the official report of the United States Commissioner of Prohibition shows that the number of arrests for violations of the prohibition amendment is greater per capita in the "dry" South, which produces our leading "dry" advocates, than in "wet" Illinois. The following figures are all taken from the report indicated, covering the year ending June 30, 1928:

State	Population estimated, 1925	Distilleries seized	Stills seized	Still worms seized	Fermenters seized	Spirits seized	Mash seized
						Gallons	Gallons
Alabama	2,467,190	414	308	3	4,298	8,207	377,634
Florida	1,253,957	820	581	850	20,981	36,596	1,097,287
Georgia	3,058,260	1,919	1,484	934	19,379	33,351	2,456,067
Total	6,779,407	3,153	2,373	1,787	44,658	78,154	3,930,988
Illinois	6,964,950	330	935	191	9,431	75,193	1,618,234

This table and figures show that there are ten times as many distilleries, three times as many stills, nine times as many still worms, five times as many fermenters, and over twice the number of gallons of mash seized in the three States with a population of 200,000 less than that of the State of Illinois. And this notwithstanding that the laws are not enforced in these dry States to the extent that they are in my State.

Now, I hope that in the future the gentleman from Florida, who believes in law and order and decency and morality, will help me and others to bring about an amendment or modification of the prohibition law, so that we can eliminate the present wave of crime that is prevalent from one section of the country to the other solely as a result of prohibition.

Mr. GREEN. I will be glad to help the gentleman if his committee will bring out a bill that will deport every alien who violates the prohibition law.

Mr. SABATH. Here I have a report from the Commissioner of Immigration for the year 1928. On page 154 of this highly informative document he will find, in Table No. 56, the facts relative to "Aliens deported (under warrant proceedings) after entering the United States, fiscal year ended June 30, 1928, by race or people and causes."

In that entire year, the latest for which we have available statistics, the total number deported for the entire United States was 11,625. Of that number, only 681 are shown to have been deported as "criminals after entry." In other words, this amounts to less than 6 per cent.

Now, the gentleman wants to know from what countries these deported persons came. This table furnishes that information, too. Of the 681 deported under the aforementioned head, 191 were returned to Mexico. It may surprise some Members of this House to know that neither the second largest number of those deported, nor the third largest number of those deported, came from any of the much-maligned southeastern European countries, but from the so-called Nordic races, so much championed here. Now, gentlemen, I dislike very much to point out the shortcomings of any people. But I feel that it is nothing short of my duty to give the country the facts on the situation. The second largest number of aliens deported as "criminals after entry" were English, of which there were 79.

Among the various races we note that 46 French were deported; also 58 Italians—a considerable number, perhaps, yet 21 fewer than of British. Deportations of some of the nationalities were: Czechoslovakian, 5; Bohemian and Moravian, none; Lithuanian, none; Rumanian, 2; Russian, 3; Bulgarian, Serbian, and Montenegrin, none; but Scotch, 29.

The fact is, gentlemen, and you may as well face the facts, the English propagandists have been fooling the American people right along. It is well known in this connection that propaganda always did constitute a big part of British diplomacy. Through British secret organizations, lobbyists, and through the press the English have succeeded in convincing the American people that the southeastern European immigration to the United States is composed mainly of the lawbreaking class.

Were we to take this propaganda at its face value, we could only conclude, and God only knows how many Americans have erroneously so concluded, that lawbreakers have been coming in from southeastern Europe by the hundreds of thousands. I have just cited figures showing how different are the real facts in the premises.

The document from which I have read to the House to-day is available to anyone. If the gentleman has not been able to secure a copy, I will be glad to furnish him one, together with additional information that will be helpful and beneficial to him in the future.

Mr. GREEN. Does not the gentleman know that it is estimated there are a million criminal aliens in the United States?

Mr. SABATH. I thank the gentleman. He always comes to my relief when I am nearly exhausted.

This statement of the gentleman from Florida, about the million of alien criminals in the United States is on par, and just as wild and untrue, as many of his other statements on the question of immigration and prohibition. It is amazing how reckless he and the other prohibitionists and restrictionists can be with facts and figures.

Now, I have with me information here that I have been furnished with only to-day by the secretary of the committee, namely, a report from the State Department. If we have no confidence in the Labor Department or the Commissioner of Immigration, although I know he is a sincere and well-meaning man, and so is the Secretary of Labor, we certainly have confidence in the Secretary of State. I am sorry that the incoming newly elected President will not see fit to reappoint the present incumbent as Secretary of Labor, because I know that he has done splendid service in the position that he occupies, and especially during the last campaign.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SABATH. No; I can not yield.

Mr. GREEN. I think the Secretary of the Treasury is the one they were most interested in.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, I know you people are interested in the Treasury and in money.

Mr. GREEN. We are interested in the Secretary of the Treasury when he opposes a $24,000,000 additional appropriation for prohibition enforcement.

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I know you and all your prohibitionists are just anxious to get hold of the $24,000,000, and, if possible, more, so that you can provide for more lucrative jobs for the professional prohibitionist fellows.

The gentleman wanted to know the number of aliens that are on the list that might be deported, and what proportion of them had been deported. I have to repeat that the number who have been deported was a little over 11,000, and I believe that under the present law the number will not be increased, although I am ready to vote for any additional appropriation that may be necessary.

Right in connection with this, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, let me call your attention to one thing: I observe that yesterday the Secretary of the Treasury agreed to an additional appropriation for the Coast Guard and for our border patrol. I have advocated for years that the service should be unified. Why should we have a thousand or twelve hundred immigration inspectors at $2,000 each and other inspectors as well doing work in the same section of our country, and doing nearly the same work? We could easily save millions of dollars and secure a better enforcement of the law on our borders and at the same time secure much better and more efficient service if the inspection force were unified, and for that reason I hope you gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations and you other men of influence will be able to bring home to the Secretary of the Treasury that information that should have been his that this department should be unified. We would be able to secure thereby an inspection and examination and control of our border lines without the additional expenditure of $2,000,000 or $5,000,000.

Now, as I am nearly exhausted—not in convincing material but in strength—I shall be glad to yield the floor. How much time have I consumed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes.

Mr. SABATH. I am thankful for the courtesy of my friend, the chairman, and the membership of the House, in giving me this opportunity at this time.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, in the momentary absence of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, Members of the House who were Members of the preceding Congress will recall that this House then passed a deportation bill. It was much more inclusive and, I think, a better bill than this one. But it did not become a law. The fault, if it was a fault, is not chargeable to this House.

During the first session of this Congress your committee reported another deportation bill, somewhat subdued, a little milder in its provisions, and that bill remained here on the calendar indefinitely and had very little prospect of passage. Now we have brought forth a third and still more subdued edition of the original deportation bill.

One reason why this bill is presented in this form is because your committee believes that it has a better chance of passage than a bill such as was reported before; and if Members are not satisfied with this measure because it does not do all the things they think should be done, I suggest to them that, although we can not accomplish all that we believe we should do, that is no reason whatever why the good that this measure will accomplish should not be done.

There are several leading features in this measure which are worthy of attention and fully justify its passage by the House. I want to call attention, first, to a group of offenses named in the first part of the bill. When aliens commit these offenses there is a summary proceeding for their deportation upon its being found that they are guilty of these offenses and are undesirable aliens. You will find them grouped in the first portion of the bill—those who engage in the sale of narcotics and others who are guilty of the commission of certain other offenses therein named. Then there is another group of offenses. When aliens commit any of those latter offenses it is necessary, before they can be deported, that they shall have been convicted in a court of record and given the sentences prescribed. In viewing this legislation and wondering why former measures have been so modified, you should give attention to the fact that we have a very large number—and I could quote official figures if it were necessary to do so—of people now in the United States who are subject to deportation and who are not being deported. It seems not wise to add a vastly increased number when the number is so great and the Government is not now dealing with them adequately. Take, for instance, aliens who are guilty of the violation of the liquor laws. A number of gentlemen have asked questions about that. I would not undertake to estimate the number, but I would say it is very great. With Congress willing to appropriate only enough money to deport about 12,000 aliens per year, it would seem to be utter folly to authorize the deportation of 50,000 or 100,000 more. We do not want the law to appear utterly helpless and ineffective, and therefore your committee has concluded for that reason to leave out a lot of these offenses. When these offenses are committed many of those who commit them are tried in a police court. The sentences are short. It is not certain that it is wise to deport a man who has been convicted in a magistrate's court or in any court other than a court of record.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When these blanket injunctions are issued during a labor dispute, it is quite possible for a man to be committed for contempt or for the disobedience of an injunction and thus come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BOX. If that is true—and I would not want to be diverted into a discussion of it—I will say to the gentleman that that line of offenses was not considered by the committee in reporting this legislation, and I think the gentleman will find that the Department of Labor must find, in addition to other things, that they are undesirable aliens.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In all these cases?

Mr. BOX. I think so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That would be helpful, but I fail to find it in the bill.

Mr. BOX. I think the gentleman will find that in the bill. Then there is another class of aliens with which we have been dealing heretofore. I refer to immigrants who approach the border, are detected, and then ordered deported. If such immigrants have been rejected at the border, they can attempt to enter and reenter repeatedly, subjecting themselves to no inconvenience except being pushed back across the border. We have inserted in this bill a provision providing for their punishment in case they attempt to reenter the country or to enter it in any manner illegally. If an adequate force is provided to intercept these who enter the country illicitly, and they are carried into the courts and punished for their efforts to disregard the immigration laws, that will have a very beneficial and helpful effect in procuring a better enforcement of the law.

There are many features of the measure which I would like to discuss with the House at length. However, an adequate discussion of them would require much more time than any of us can take under the circumstances here. I therefore merely say to my colleagues that while this measure does not accomplish all that the country would like to accomplish in this direction, it is a moderate but substantial improvement of the present law. The committee amendment, which I understand the chairman expects to present, ought to be adopted and the bill as thus amended ought to pass the House. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill that is good as far as it goes. I would like to see the committee offer a much more stringent deportation bill in view of the fact that the department, as I understand, has estimated there are now 1,000,000 aliens in the United States who entered unlawfully.

I would also like to see the bill go far enough to deport for one offense, though it happened to carry only a 30-day conviction, be it for prohibition violation or what not. I do not entertain the sob stuff about separating families, and all the propaganda which is usually forced before the committees and before the House in regard to breaking down the immigration laws.

I believe if our department has not sufficient machinery to enforce the deportation laws, the Congress, in defense and in protection of the laboring forces of America and the homes and institutions of America, should provide sufficient funds for this purpose.

I believe there is no more serious question confronting the organized labor forces of the Nation and the institutions of our Government than the immigration question. If you will examine the criminal records you will find that, in proportion to alien population, the percentage of criminals is largely foreign.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. A little later. I think you will find the percentage is 80 per cent, according to population.

Mr. COMBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. A little later. You will find that 80 per cent of them are of foreign birth, I believe, that is according to population. You will find that the communistic and bolshevistic influences which are here in our Nation are invariably emanating from persons of foreign birth.

Then, my colleagues, when we know these things and when we are sworn to protect the Constitution, when we pay our taxes to uphold American institutions, why not meet these problems frankly? I favor closing the immigration doors and deporting all undesirable aliens. [Applause.]

If we stand for restricted immigration, vote for all these measures and instruct your immigration committees to bring out more drastic bills, even though the august body which sits at the other end of the Capitol seems to be laboring under a different spell.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. GREEN. I will.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Where does the gentleman find that 1,000,000 unlawful aliens are in the United States?

Mr. GREEN. One million aliens unlawfully entered the United States and are now here.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Where does the gentleman get that information?

Mr. GREEN. I understand that is a statement that has recently been made by the Immigration Bureau.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Does the gentleman state that upon his own knowledge?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly not. I have not checked it up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

There being no further general debate, the bill will be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following aliens shall, upon warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported in the manner provided in sections 19 and 20 of the immigration act of 1917 (U. S. C. title 8, secs. 155, 156), if the Secretary of Labor, after hearing, finds that such aliens are undesirable residents of the United States:

(1) An alien who hereafter violates or conspires to violate the white slave traffic act (U. S. C. title 18, secs. 397–404), or any law amendatory of, supplementary to, or in substitution for, such act.

(2) An alien who hereafter violates or conspires to violate any statute of the United States taxing, prohibiting, or regulating the manufacture, production, compounding, possession, use, sale, exchange, dispensing, giving away, transportation, importation, or exportation of opium, coca leaves, or any salt, derivative, or preparation of opium or coca leaves.

(3) An alien who hereafter willfully conceals or harbors, attempts to conceal or harbor, or aids, assists, or abets any other person to conceal or harbor, any alien liable to deportation.

(4) An alien who hereafter willfully aids or assists in any way any alien unlawfully to enter the United States.

(5) Any alien who hereafter enters the United States at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials, or eludes examination or inspection by immigration officials, or obtains entry to the United States by a willfully false or misleading representation or the willful concealment of a material fact.

(6) An alien who is convicted of any offense (committed after the enactment of this act and at any time after entry) for which he is sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more, and who is thereafter convicted of the same or any other offense (committed after the enactment of this act and at any time after entry) for which he is sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more.

(7) An alien who is convicted of any offense (committed after the enactment of this act and within 10 years after entry) for which he is sentenced to imprisonment for a term which, when added to the terms to which sentenced under two or more previous convictions of the same or any other offense (committed after the enactment of this act), amounts to two years or more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, after line 9, insert a new subsection to read as follows:

"(8) An alien who is convicted of carrying on or about the person, transporting, or possessing any weapon or explosive bomb, for which he is sentenced to imprisonment for a term of six months or more; or who, having been convicted of carrying on or about the person, transporting, or possessing any weapon or explosive bomb, is thereafter convicted of carrying on or about the person, transporting, or possessing any weapon or explosive bomb, regardless of the sentence in either case. This subsection shall apply only in the case of offenses committed after the enactment of this act."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is self-explanatory.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Even the case under this provision would be subject to review by the Secretary of Labor as provided in the first section here as an undesirable alien?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, after line 9, and after the amendment just agreed to, insert a new subdivision to read as follows:

"An alien who has no lawful and visible means of livelihood, who has been convicted for the second time as a vagrant, if it appears that in each case at the time of his arrest, he was carrying on his person or in a vehicle, a concealed pistol, revolver, gun, or bomb."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment that I alluded to before, and it ought to pass without any opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington) there were 26 ayes and 42 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I doubt whether anything I may say will influence your vote, but I think you are working very fast and certainly working in haste. I venture to say that 9 out of 10 Members of the House can not explain if I asked them certain questions regarding this legislation, and how drastic it is. I am not going to speak about the constitutionality of the bill, I will leave that to my colleagues and the gentleman from Florida.

So far as I am concerned, I will give you the meat of the proposition.

The new deportation bill is a decided improvement over the bill reported by the committee. It does not change the limitation statute of the existing deportation provisions. It does not make the inspectors of immigration judges and jurors or give them any discretionary powers. It consists of seven sections, which briefly provide as follows:

First. It deports all violators of the white slave traffic act. We have no objection to that.

Second. It deports all violators of the narcotic act. We have no objection to that.

Third. It deports any alien who willfully harbors or conceals aliens liable to deportation. We have no objection to that.

Fourth. It deports any alien who assists willfully another alien to enter the United States unlawfully. We have no objection to that.

Fifth. It deports aliens who enter the United States at an improper place or elude examination by an immigration inspector. We have no objection to that.

Sixth. It deports an alien who is convicted of any offense for which he is sentenced for one year or more. I certainly object to this clause. If the offense were a felony, I have no objection, but I can not accept the broad definition of "offense," which appears in the act.

Seventh. The same objection applies to the next provision, which makes an alien deportable if two or more convictions will total 2 years or more within 10 years after entry. The same objection is made as is made to the preceding provision. If the offense be a felony, I am satisfied; but where it is the violation of some police regulation or the prohibition law, I certainly can not accept it.

An attempt was made a number of years ago to insert in the deportation bill the question of violations of the prohibition law. So far as I am concerned, I am not talking about alien violators who willfully attempt to smuggle liquor into the United States or moonshiners or persons who are bringing in poisonous liquors. What I am referring to is persons who innocently and under circumstances may be found in possession of liquor and who may be sentenced for one year or more by some judge who is a fanatic on the question. It is needless for me to mention the States in which judges habitually impose stiff sentences for the most trivial liquor violation.

It may further happen that a poor alien, who may otherwise have a good moral character and who has raised an American family, may be subject to the attack under this proposed amendment if he should by chance be convicted of a violation of the prohibition law.

Proponents of this bill apparently do not want to insert a paragraph in this proposed deportation bill by saying so in the American language that they intend to deport persons who violate the prohibition law, and so they express it under the heading of "any offense."

It is needless to say that this offense, if committed by anybody, does not make him an undesirable person to remain in the United States; and we can not compare them to persons who violate the white slave traffic law and the narcotic act.

Objection must be raised to the provisions of section 2, where in a case of an indeterminate term the term actually served shall be considered on the basis of the length of sentence. It will be observed that under the laws of New York, for instance, a good many misdemeanors, even of a trivial nature, are punishable by an indeterminate term, and therefore a person may be convicted several times of trifling violations of law and have deportation stare him in the face if this bill is not amended

I respectfully suggest that wherever the term "offense" appears in the act it should be changed to "felony." If that correction is made, I shall be prepared to accept the bill as it stands.

The minority of the committee is not opposed to deportation; as a matter of fact, in seven sections you will find in the proposed deportation law, to five of them we have no objection. I want to call your earnest and serious attention to sections 6 and 7 of this proposed bill. In my opinion, if you read it twice you will hesitate as to whether or not you would agree to the policy and advisability of striking it out.

As to the proposition on page 7, paragraph 6, where it says a person convicted of "any offense." Why do they not provide for a person convicted of a felony instead of a person convicted of "any offense"? The present deportation law is, I maintain, more than sufficient to deport every undesirable alien. Whether it is going to be workable or not, it is a repetition of the same deportation provisions that we had in the previous act.

Mr. CRAIL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. CRAIL. In the gentleman's State, can they send a man to prison for a year for anything less than a felony?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes; they can for a misdemeanor. We can send them up for a indeterminate sentence, which means three years.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. For spitting on the sidewalk.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes. Under the provisions of this bill a person who has been here for 20 years and who has committed three or four offenses, if they total up to 2 years in the 20 years, can be deported, and what are you going to do with his wife and family; who is going to take care of that wife and family?

Mr. GREEN. Send them with him.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Oh, the only time that I can answer the gentleman's question is, if he will come back with me to-morrow and tell me the difference between a white horse and a black horse and which horse eats more, then I shall be in a better position to yield to some of his questions.

Mr. GREEN. I will do that if the gentleman will support with me a proposition closing the doors to immigration altogether for five years.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Then you would have to throw everyone out of Florida.

Mr. GREEN. I am in favor of a restriction for five years.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. You better go back home and tell some of your townsmen not to charge $1 for a glass of beer that is not worth a nickel. [Laughter.] You go back and tell them that.

Mr. GREEN. If the gentleman knows of a place in Florida or elsewhere where they sell beer openly, I will send the prohibition agents there.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If the gentleman will come with me to-morrow, I will show him where it is.

Mr. GREEN. I will not go with you. You take the prohibition agents with you.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that both gentlemen are out of order, and I shall insist upon their proceeding in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] desires to entirely close the doors to immigrants and wants to deport everybody. His speech indicates that the only criminals are aliens. I would like to see him so amend his views as to be willing to deport the notorious criminals in the Ku-Klux Klan organization.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 2, after the word "offense," insert the words "involving moral turpitude"; and on page 4, line 3, after the word "offense," insert the words "involving moral turpitude."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I submit this amendment for the purpose of making clear what I am sure is the intent of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But it is not the intent of the committee.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, that is a frank and honest admission. Therefore I shall change my statement and say that I offer my amendment in order to make this law somewhat in keeping with the ideas of fair men and men who are versed in the law. To have this law apply to men who are convicted of offenses which the chairman of the committee has declared do not necessarily involve moral turpitude is so extreme as to make its very purpose ridiculous. We have the declaration of the chairman that it is not the intention of the committee to deport only in cases involving moral turpitude, and that destroys the logical, the sensible, the sound and honest intent, as described by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box]. You have a proposition here which requires very serious attention. If it is limited to offenses involving moral turpitude, then you embrace in the provisions of the law cases of murder, assault, burglary, robbery, arson, rape, all the crimes in the penal laws known as malum per se. But if you leave it open, with the meaning which the chairman of the committee has declared is the intention of the committee, you are providing for deportation in cases of violation of traffic regulations, or in violation of a town ordinance, a misdemeanor, or any trivial matter, and, mark you, without a statute of limitation. A man may be deported for the most trivial offenses.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman understands that the present deportation laws have to do with those who are convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude. This prosecution is dealing with two convictions, each of a year or more, and it is not likely that any court in the land will send anybody up for one year for violating a traffic regulation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman that right in the great State of Pennsylvania in the coal region a man may be sent to jail for standing on the street. The private coal and iron police of the coal companies—thugs and perjurers, that is what they are—may send a man to jail for holding a meeting on his own property. That is the situation I am trying to overcome.

Mr. TARVER. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman I am sure is aware that the highest courts in the country have sustained the ruling that the manufacture and sale of intoxicants is not a crime involving moral turpitude. If this amendment is adopted, any bootlegger or manufacturer of intoxicating liquor could not be deported irrespective of conviction.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will support my amendment, I will support an amendment providing for the deportation of the bootlegger.

Mr. TARVER. I would accede to the gentleman's proposal if I could be assured that such an amendment——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will withdraw my amendment if the gentleman will offer such an amendment.

Mr. TARVER. I have such an amendment prepared, and if the gentleman will withdraw his amendment I will offer my amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to say to the gentleman from Georgia that the proposition contained in this bill and as admitted by the chairman of the committee is so extreme, so farfetched that my amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I ask for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TARVER. If the gentleman will stand by his statement and withdraw his amendment, I will offer my amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I ask unanimous consent that my amendment may be held in abeyance pending the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MCCORMACK. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER) there were—ayes 10, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 13, strike out the words "in any way."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I hope you have before you the bill, and if you will look at page 3——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What line?

Mr. SABATH. Line 12.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The committee will accept the amendment. I would like to say the words mean nothing anyway, and there is no objection to striking them out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 4, strike out "10" and insert "5."

Mr. SABATH. You will find, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, on page 4, paragraph 7, starting out with line 3, the following:

(7) An alien who is convicted of any offense (committed after the enactment of this act and within 10 years after entry) for which he is sentenced to imprisonment for a term which, when added to the terms to which sentenced under two or more previous convictions of the same or any other offense (committed after the enactment of this act), amounts to two years or more.

My amendment strikes out the word "10" and substitutes the word "five," so that the paragraph will provide—that within five years after his entry—

In lieu of 10 years, and so forth.

Now, we know that after a man has been here for five years he has, more or less, acquired the habits and customs of our country, and if, in due course of time, he commits some violation or offense of which he may be found guilty, which may be only a misdemeanor, or he may be guilty of something else, and due to two or three such convictions, sentence would amount to two years, he could be deported up to 10 years of his residence within the United States. Now, I feel that it would be reasonable if we would shorten that to five instead of ten.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Does not the gentleman think that instead of using "any conviction" it would be better to use the word "felony" in sections 6 and 7?

Mr. SABATH. I am not speaking of that. This amendment is pending now, and I feel that it should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I have been trying for 15 minutes to get the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. TARVER and Mr. SCHAFER demanded a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 8.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws the point of order.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, may I proceed for two minutes out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, did we not just adopt the motion of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] closing debate on the pending question?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. TILSON. I am not going to debate the question at all, I assure the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the rule under which we are now operating, it will be necessary to continue to-day if this bill is to be finished under the rule. It happens that we have now reached about the hour of adjournment, and it seems that we have several sections of the bill still to consider that will require some little time. To-morrow we are to be in session and the day is not crowded at all. I am wondering whether if we rose and went into the House we might be able to secure unanimous consent to go on with this bill to-morrow instead of continuing to-day. Is there anyone who will object to this request in the House?

Mr. TARVER. I object.

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall object unless the vote taken to close debate on the section is vacated.

Mr. TARVER. I shall object unless I shall be afforded the same opportunity of presenting my amendment as other Members have had.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There is no desire at all, I will say to the gentleman, to keep off legitimate and proper amendments. Just as the gentleman from Connecticut has said, the rules confine us to one day. The hour is getting late. If we can come to an agreement by unanimous consent, we may be able to finish the bill.

Mr. TARVER. I shall object unless you follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin that we vacate the motion to close debate.

Mr. TILSON. The committee can vacate its own aetion at this stage by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If we can have the understanding that we are not foreclosed because the rule provides for one day and can continue to-morrow, I will be very pleased to give the gentleman the time he wants.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will state that while I shall invoke every honorable and fair parliamentary and strategic measure to defeat the bill I will not avail myself of the privilege of raising the question of consideration to-morrow. I think it is for the best interests of all concerned that we have more time to-morrow to consider the bill.

Mr. TILSON. It seems to me that is true, and if the Members present are willing to agree to this I should like to make the request in the House, where it will be binding.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings of the committee by which debate on this section was closed. Is there objection?

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, should there be an objection when we go into the House, I presume the procedure will be that we will go back into the Committee of the Whole and complete our labors to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is so understood.

Mr. GREEN. And the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] will be given an opportunity to offer his amendment to-morrow?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings limiting debate on this section. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In accordance with the understanding just reached, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I have an amendment at the Clerk's desk. What will be the status of that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio has not yet been reported. It can be offered to-morrow when the House is in the Committee of the Whole. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Washington that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BACON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate bill 5094, making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on to-morrow it may be in order to continue the consideration of Senate bill 5094, which has been under consideration in the Committee of the Whole to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that to-morrow it shall be in order to consider Senate bill 5094. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Under the rule?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule; yes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mrs. NORTON, for an indefinite period, on account of illness.

BATTLE FIELDS AT BRICES CROSS ROADS AND TUPELO, MISS.—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 8736) to provide for the inspection of the battle field of Brices Cross Roads, Miss., and the battle field of Tupelo, or Harrisburg, Miss., for printing under the rule.

CONSTRUCTION AT THE MILITARY ACADEMY—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 11469) to authorize appropriations for construction at the United States Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., for printing under the rule.

MORRIS FOX CHERRY—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 12538) for the benefit of Morris Fox Cherry, for printing under the rule.

DEFINITION OF THE TERMS "CHILD" AND "CHILDREN"—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 12449) to define the terms "child" and "children" as used in the acts of May 18, 1920, and June 10, 1922, for printing under the rule.

THE CONGRESSIONAL CEMETERY

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon a bill which I have introduced in the House and which has been favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill relating to the Congressional Cemetery, and I desire to include in that extension certain data included in the report of the hearings about this cemetery.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on a bill introduced by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, the Military Affairs Committee has reported unanimously H. R. 11916, a bill introduced by me for the care and preservation of certain lands and monuments in the Congressional Cemetery.

This historic cemetery, in which many of the Nation's heroes and great men are buried, has been allowed to lapse into decay and the monuments and gravestones to deteriorate for the want of proper care and protection. A large part of this cemetery is Government-owned ground. The Government cared for the same for quite a while, but for many years no care has been given it.

The bill introduced by me and recommended by the Military Affairs Committee puts the care of that part of the cemetery owned by the Government under the supervision of the War Department.

In the hearings before the committee certain historical data concerning the Congressional Cemetery were produced, and under the permission granted me I am having the same inserted in my remarks. I am also including certain letters and other data showing the patriotic organizations which favor this bill, which were also placed in the hearings.

The Sons of the American Revolution submitted to me for the committee the following data:

1. The remains of Jacob Gideon, a Revolutionary soldier, lie in Congressional Cemetery. He is of special interest also because two of his descendants, Philip F. and John B. Larner, are members of the Columbia Historical Society and the Sons of the American Revolution. Jacob Gideon was a trumpeter and private in the Pennsylvania Militia. His name also appears in the index of Eckenrode's Virginia Archives. The inscription on his monument, a marble slab, reads:

"In memory of Jacob Gideon, a soldier of the Revolution; died March 3, 1841, aged 87 years."

In the National Intelligencer of March 5, 1841, appeared the following notice:

"Died in this city on Wednesday evening, the 3d instant, Mr. Jacob Gideon, sr., a soldier of the Revolution, aged 87 years. His friends and acquaintances and those of his son, Jacob Gideon, jr., are requested to attend his funeral this morning, Friday, at 11 o'clock, from the residence of his son, on Seventh Street between E and F Streets."

2. Capt. Hugh George Campbell: The actual Revolutionary services of this Hugh George Campbell are somewhat shrouded. His name does not appear in any of the indexes of the South Carolina archives. It is, however, an indubitable fact, obtained from the current literature of his later life, that the inscription on his monument states the historical truth. The inscription reads as follows:

"Beneath this marble rest the mortal remains of Hugh George Campbell, late a captain in the Navy of the United States. He was a native of the State of South Carolina. In the year 1775 he entered as a volunteer on board the first vessel of the war commissioned by the council of his native State. He served his country upward of 22 years as a comrade and died in this city on the 11th day of November, 1820, aged about 62 years."

"Calahan, in Officers of the Navy, 1775 to 1800, has this entry:

"'Hugh George Campbell appointed commander 27 July, 1799, captain 16 October, 1800.'"

3. In the Congressional Cemetery lie the remains of Hon. Elbridge Gerry, who was gathered unto his fathers in Washington during his second year as Vice President, on November 23, 1814. The military services of Gerry are noted by Heitman. It is proper also to record that he was born at Marblehead, Mass., July 17, 1744, graduated at Harvard, and became a member of the Continental Congress of 1776. He was also a member of the First National Congress of 1789 and was one of the envoys sent to establish relations with France in 1797. He was elected Governor of Massachusetts in 1810 and Vice President of the United States in 1812. His grave is covered with a handsome monument which was erected by an act of Congress in 1823.

4. At this point it will be well to record that Gen. George Clinton was originally interred in Congressional Cemetery, where he remained until a few years ago, when his body was transferred to New York with considerable ceremony.

5. Gen. James Jackson, one of the most distinguished Georgians, reposes in Congressional Cemetery. His enviable military record is to be found in Heitman, and more extensively, together with his civil life, in The National Portrait Gallery. He was Governor of Georgia, and United States Senator from 1801 to March, 1806. He passed away on the 19th day of March, of that year, and was interred, the Portrait Gallery states, "Four miles from Washington," which was, in fact, Rock Creek Churchyard. He was reinterred in Congressional Cemetery under one of those quaint cenotaphs. A Revolutionary War, D. A. R. marker stands on his grave and the last phrase of the inscription on his tomb is "a soldier of the Revolution."

6. Senator Uriah Tracey, of Connecticut: Connecticut Men in the Revolution lists the name of Uriah Tracey in a company that marched from sundry places for the relief of Boston, etc., in the Lexington alarm, 1775, and were formed into an independent and ranging company at Roxbury. The military services of Senator Tracey were of a clerical nature for a short period. There is nothing on his grave to permanently record his army connection. He was the first Congressman to be interred in Congressional Cemetery. This occurred July 19, 1807, by exhumation from Rock Creek.

7. Gen. Thomas Blount, a Representative from North Carolina, was born in Edgecomb County, May 10, 1759, and at the age of 16 entered the Revolutionary Army. In 1780 he became a deputy paymaster general, and was a major commanding a battalion of North Carolina Militia at the Battle of Eutaw Springs. The congressional biography ranks him a major general of militia. He enjoyed a long congressional career, passing away while a Member February 7, 1812. There is no inscription on his monument of patriot service.

8. Hon. Levi Casey, of South Carolina, served in the Revolutionary War as a brigadier general of militia. He was born in South Carolina in 1749, and died in Washington February 1, 1807. Evidence seems to show that his ashes were placed in Congressional Cemetery by reinterment August 1, 1832. His gravestone contains no patriot inscription.

9. The Pennsylvania muster rolls record Henry Black as a private, York County Militia; corporal, Cumberland County Militia; and captain, Bedford County Militia. He was a Member of Congress from Somerset, Pa. This patriot passed away November 28, 1841, but evidently was reinterred in Congressional Cemetery June, 1842. There is no Revolutionary marker.

10. Col. James Morrison, of Lexington, Ky., died in Washington, D. C., April 23, 1823. He was a native of Pennsylvania, and Heitman registers him as an ensign, Eighth Pennsylvania, from 21st of December, 1778, until he retired January 1, 1781. Colonel Morrison settled in Lexington, Ky., in 1792, and became a man of great wealth and founder of Morrison College in Lexington. He was State representative from Fayette and quartermaster general. The only record on his monument of military service is the title "colonel."

11. Dr. Elisha Harrison's remains also repose in Congressional Cemetery. His name is found in the Maryland archives and also in Heitman's, where he is recorded as enlisting in the Fourth Maryland the 15th of October, 1781, and retired 1st of January, 1783. The doctor entered into rest August 26, 1819, aged 59. The site of his original interment is not known, but he was transferred to Congressional Cemetery April, 1823. Part of the chiseling on his monument reads as follows: "A native of Maryland and surgeon in the Revolutionary War."

12. "Maj. John Kinney, of New Jersey, an officer in the Army of the Revolution, died in this city July 17, 1832, aged 75 years," is cut in another monument in Congressional Cemetery. John Kinney's name as an ensign, New Jersey Line, is found in United States Pension Roll, page 514. Heitman gives him a splendid record for three years' service.

13. James Gillespie, a Member of Congress from North Carolina, passed away January 11, 1805. His patriot record includes membership in the State house of commons 1779–1783. The ashes of this distinguished man were transferred to Congressional Cemetery from the old Presbyterian Cemetery April 14, 1892, and now lie under a marble monument just south of the superintendent's residence. The only inscription is "James Gillespie, North Carolina, died January 11, 1805."

14. H. Brockholst Livingston was born in New York City November 26, 1757, and died in the District of Columbia March 19, 1823. He entered the Revolutionary Army with the grade of captain and won the rank of lieutenant colonel. Colonel Livingston became also an eminent diplomat and jurist, being a Justice of the United States Supreme Court.

The body of Hon. James Jones, of Georgia, rests in Congressional Cemetery. There was a James Jones in Georgia who was a prominent civil patriot, but it has not been possible to make identification. Representative Jones may have been this Georgia State assemblyman, but some facts of residence seem to indicate that he was not.

The remains of Tobias Lear, the private secretary of George Washington and foreign emissary, repose in Congressional Cemetery. Some reports include Lear as worthy of Revolutionary honors. He came of a patriot family, and a "Tobias Lear" signed a petition to the State committee of safety from Portsmouth, N. H., May 5, 1777. Reliable biographies give the date of his birth September 19, 1792, and this would make his age such as to cast doubt on his signing the petition. The signature is probably that of his father, Capt. Tobias Lear, sr. The career of Tobias Lear, jr., seems to have begun after he was graduated from Harvard in 1783.

A letter from the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution favoring the bill:

NATIONAL SOCIETY, DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1928.

MY DEAR MR. ABERNETHY: It is said that in the Congressional Cemetery, established in 1807, in Washington, D. C., more patriots whose names are linked with our early history are buried than in any other single cemetery in the country. Two Vice Presidents of the United States, one of them a signer of the Declaration of Independence, are interred there. Private soldiers and those in high command of the Continental Army sleep side by side in the democracy of death.

Within this historic setting, the United States Congress of that day selected Christ Church burying ground (known as the Congressional Cemetery) as the resting place for Senators and Representatives who should die in office. Up to 1835 this custom prevailed.

There, weather stained and moss covered, stand the quaint congressional cenotaphs erected by a grateful country in honor of these early Americans.

It is entirely fitting and proper that these cenotaphs, now crumbling in ruin, should be restored and preserved by act of the Congress of to-day.

Therefore I, as president general of the National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution, heartily indorse and urge the passage of the bill now before the Congress for the preservation of these early memorials to our patriot dead.

The preservation of these memorials is strictly in line with the objects of our society: "To perpetuate the memory and spirit of the men and women who achieved American independence by the acquisition and protection of historic spots and the erection of monuments." Such monuments will inspire the youth of to-day to emulate their ancestors and to live up to their ideals by sustaining our institutions of Government which have so long endured.

Very sincerely yours,

GRACE H. BROSSEAU
(Mrs. Alfred J. Brosseau),
President General,
National Society Daughters of the American Revolution.

The War Department for the committee furnished certain data concerning this Congressional Cemetery which I print in part, as I am sure it will be most interesting to the Congress and to many people in the country at large:

In compliance with instructions contained in your memorandum dated May 23, 1928, an investigation has been made of the land and monuments owned by the Government in the Congressional Cemetery which would be turned over to the Secretary of War for care and preservation if H. R. 11916 is enacted into law. The following are the facts according to the best information that could be obtained:

1. Ownership of cemetery: The cemetery is owned by the Vestry of Christ Church, Washington Parish, G Street between Sixth and Seventh Street SE., Washington, D. C. It is an active cemetery with the remains of about 60,000 people buried there and about 9,000 available grave sites.

2. Government-owned lands: See map attached as Exhibit A.

3. Burials: Attached hereto as Exhibit B is a list of the persons who are now or who apparently have at some time been buried in Government-owned lots.

A study of this list shows that the grave sites in ranges 24, 25, 29, 30, 31, 54, 56, 57, 59, and 60 are occupied by the graves of 87 Members of Congress and other high Government officials and distinguished personages who were evidently buried in this cemetery by the authority of Congress. In these ranges are also 96 cenotaphs which were erected to the memory of persons whose remains have either been removed from the cemetery for burial elsewhere or who were never buried in this cemetery. It appears to have been the practice at one time to erect cenotaphs to the memory of distinguished persons regardless of whether or not they were actually buried in the Congressional Cemetery.

The grave sites in ranges 61 and 62 are vacant and the cemetery records do not show that any burials have ever been made therein.

In ranges 97 and 98 are buried the remains of 21 employees who were killed in an explosion at the Washington Arsenal, now the Army War College, in June, 1864.

In ranges 147, 148, and 149 are buried the remains of 99 sailors and marines.

4. Monuments: An inspection of the cemetery shows that there are 270 monuments of which 96 are Government headstones, 164 are cenotaphs, and 10 are ordinary monuments.

In that portion of the cemetery which was reserved for the burial of Members of Congress and other high Government officials and distinguished personages the monuments are all of the cenotaph type except 9, which are ordinary monuments. These cenotaphs are made of Aquia Creek stone, a soft sandstone, which is rapidly deteriorating, and many of them are in a dilapidated condition. (See photographs attached as Exhibit C.) This stone is very much inferior to the Aquia Creek stone that is cut at present owing to the fact that at the time of cutting existing cenotaphs modern machinery was not known and only the soft grade was used so that it could be cut by hand. The present grade of Aquia Creek stone is much harder and has a better surface for carving. For monumental purposes it can not be compared with marble or granite and the cost is about one-half that of granite. The condition of these cenotaphs is such as to make the preparation of an estimate for their repair a very difficult matter. On many of them the dies are broken and disintegrated. Others have bases or caps broken, and in some instances the foundations have settled resulting in damage to stones and throwing them out of alignment. An examination of these cenotaphs shows the following conditions:

Foundations defective	27
Sub-bases broken or disintegrated	48
Bases broken or disintegrated	35
Dies broken or disintegrated	43
Inscriptions completely obliterated	11
Caps broken or disintegrated	10

It is estimated that 48 of these cenotaphs could not be repaired, and if it is desired to replace them with similar stones of Aquia Creek stone the cost will be approximately $575 each, or a total cost of $27,600. Of the remaining 116 cenotaphs many have holes, broken corners, and other defects which can be repaired with cement at an estimated cost of $4 each, or a total cost of $468, but such repairs will be of only temporary benefit, since the nature of this stone is such that it will be only a few years before many of the 116 now in fair condition will crumble and need to be replaced.

These cenotaphs are most unattractive in appearance and any attempt made to repair them or to replace those which are broken and disintegrated with similar cenotaphs of like design will not improve the condition to any great extent. A much better solution of the problem would be to remove all the cenotaphs and to erect suitable granite or marble monuments to mark the graves of those who are now actually buried in the cemetery. The advisability of reerecting monuments to those persons who are not buried in the cemetery is a matter which should be determined by Congress.

In addition to the cenotaphs requiring repairs a marble monument on range 29, erected to Hugh George Campbell, was found to be in very bad condition. Defective foundation has caused this monument to settle and become out of plumb. The marble veneer of the die is broken and unless repairs are made soon the monument will fall apart. It is estimated that repairing the monument and preparing a suitable foundation will cost $350. The other monuments are in fair condition and do not need special repairs.

In range 97 is a monument erected to the memory of those who were killed in an explosion at the Washington Arsenal in June, 1864.

The monuments erected in ranges 147, 148, and 149 are Government headstones.

5. Military persons buried in private plots: The superintendent of the cemetery states that there are approximately 600 of such burials. It is practically impossible to get accurate information on this subject due to the fact that the cemeterial records which extend back for a period of over 100 years do not show it. The same is true of monuments erected by the Government on private plots. The cemetery records do not show any such monuments.

6. Cost of maintenance: The Government does not contribute toward the maintenance of these lots. The question of perpetual care or annual cost of maintenance was taken up with one of the vestrymen of Christ Church, but no information on this subject could be obtained until after a meeting is held early in December. The condition of the lots owned by the Government is practically the same as that of the other lots in the cemetery. To put the Government-owned lots in good condition will not be a very great task. A few loads of soil and sod with the labor of two men for 30 days should put the entire area in such condition that it could be easily maintained in good condition thereafter. It is estimated that this could be done for $420. If these lots are to be maintained by the Government, it is estimated that they could be maintained in good condition by one laborer at $1,200 per year and approximately $100 per year for supplies.

It is probable that satisfactory arrangements could be made with the Congressional Cemetery to maintain these lots in good condition at a reasonable charge.

7. Summary: The following table summarizes the information obtained. It shows the Government-owned lots, the number of burials, and character of service, whether military or nonmilitary, whether graves are occupied or unoccupied, the kind of monument erected, and the number of graves that are unmarked.

MOTION-PICTURE CENSORSHIP

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a speech delivered by me before the National Board of Review of Motion Pictures on the subject of motion-picture censorship.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech delivered by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is to the credit of Congress that after thorough hearings on the Swope and Upshaw motion picture bills that the committee decided not to report either bill. We should have sent these bills to the Smithsonian Institute, bureau of medieval atrocities, as fine specimens of mental wracks and thumbscrews. Upshaw and Swope have passed off the political stage and a new joy killer has appeared in the bill of Congressman HUDSON, of Michigan. His bill is the deformed successor of the others, and is dying a beautiful death under the political anesthesia in our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The Federal Government, documented by the Constitution, was intended to combine our States and people against foreign aggression. The Constitution had an objective purpose. It was not to be considered to subjectively turn in on the individuals and the States and interfere with their rights and powers. It guaranteed freedom of speech and a free press. It was developed by men of heterogeneous stock and habits, not as a mold to standardize our people, but to weld them all as a unit against the outside world.

However, the reformers have seized upon the Constitution as the jawbone of an ass to smite the Philistines who believe that this is the land of the free. The arguments for censorship are largely based on the theory that the National Government is a sort of a hierarchy; that Americanism is a religion which denies the right of choice to the individual conscience and sets up a standard of morals in conformity with the notions of the political group in power The state was never supposed to be a church, nor was the church supposed to be the state. The state is not a preacher, nor is the church supposed to be a grand jury or a sheriff. We do not want a pulpit parliament in America. The rectitude that the church requires is of a much higher order than the rectitude the state requires for its purposes. The church has in mind the hereafter. The state is created for temporal purposes, such as protection from foreign invasion, advancement of commerce, science, and kindred activities. Particularly is this so of the United States, whose origin is due to the courageous men and women who fled from religious persecution and who wanted to live freely according to their ideas. Good Christian reformers are generally unconscious heretics, for they deny man a God-given conscience. In motion pictures they want to substitute their own artistic notions for the general intelligence and a Federal regulation for the free will of man.

The strange thing about the reformers who advocate motion-picture censorship is that they claim there is a crime wave due to the pictures, but when the same reformers argue for prohibition they insist that prohibition has eliminated crime. It is also a strange thing that when these reformers argue for prohibition they point out those States which have censorship are States which have great increase in crime. We had no crime wave before prohibition but we had motion pictures without censorship. As a matter of fact, records will show that the increase in crime wave is largely confined to the crime of highway robbery, and that there is no increase in the number of sexual crimes since the pictures, and that type of offense is generally charged by reformers as being caused by the pictures.

One of the chief arguments for censorship was that Russia has a national censorship proposition, but Canon Chase overlooks the fact that Russia is also an advocate of atheism. The reformers are highly upset because pictures sometimes show the evils of prohibition, and they want a censorship to stop such displays. Therefore you would have a national political body being able to censor pictures that might show to the American people views that would affect the administration politically. This is all opposed to our notions of free speech and of free press.

The great pictures that have been recently produced have been a powerful argument against a political censorship. The best answer to the reformers is in handsome edifices erected for the movies. Surely they are not monuments to indecency built by an indecent public; but if they were, they would be an improvement over the old dives and dens of vice. They have indicated that the box office itself is a strong and voluntary regulation of the picture production which has been in the interest of better moral atmosphere. Because some of those engaged in the picture production have been found guilty of moral dereliction is no reason for censorship. There have been men and women in all walks of life "caught with the goods," but that is no reason why their particular callings should require a national political censorship.

I venture to state that in the aggregate, the devotion to Venus, though surreptitious and collateral, is as great in the choir lofts as it is openly and notoriously in Hollywood. We have too many bureaus in Washington now interfering with life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and nobody with any sanity on public questions will be in favor of this added bureaucratic despotism to engage in the field of morals. If we keep it up, we will not only have our morals regulated by Washington but there will be a guard of etiquette deputies and he who offends in his manners will be clapped into jail by a Federal agent. I believe that unregulated movies are giving better service than highly regulated public utilities. The reformers argue that the nations of the world have national censorships, but the United States, without national censorships and with but 7 per cent of the world's population, is furnishing 85 per cent of the world's films.

In all the censorship bills that undetermined quality known as sex appeal is recognized as a legal entry. The bills provide that there shall be no pictures with exaggerated sex appeal inasmuch as the acts do not set forth what is the exaggeration that must be construed with another act, to wit, the Volstead Act; and I take it that there shall not be allowed more than one-half of 1 per cent of sex appeal. Whether or not this is to be measured by weight or volume, I suppose is left to the censors. It is quite positive that brunettes will be permitted a greater allowance based on the blonde preferentials set forth in a classical scientific treatise on the subject.

If all the present city and State censorship boards can not satisfactorily excise the movies, what hope is there in a Federal board. If the movies increasingly vitiate under existing censorships, why create a Federal board unless to insure debauchery.

Any realistic picture of current life, must carry the impressions of revolt. Not the least read parts of the Old Testament are the unholy passages on Sodom and Gomorrah. All ages have carried their wanton and wastrels, and they force their capers on the art and panorama of their times.

Movie goers are generally given to moderation. Devotees of other entertainments more likely take part in excess. This is the age of excess; life has been speeded up; leisure has become attenuated, and consequently crammed with more intensive distractions. The high-strung go in for the periodical low lives.

Reformers are an unnatural and unhappy lot. The thin ones are ghastly and hatrackety and the fat ones are swampy and obscene. Just as they seem miscast in healthy environment, their mental protégé, censorship, is unrealistic. Art and man are better natural.

We seem due for a barrage of legislation from the artillery of reform from Bishop Cannon to Canon Chase. The boys tasted blood on election day and the whirlwind of the Lord is going into high. The ark of the constitutional covenant will be padlocked and the land of the free is to be put under injunction by the high court of the Victorian conscience. The chancellor of the exchequer will pass the hat for the propagation of bigotry.

The movies will be the first victim for the operation of the intolerants. All else which gives joy in life had better prepare for the tomb.

The liberals should swing into action—save America for decency—issue a general "as you were" order. The war gave the individual an inferiority complex. The Government regulated the citizen as though he were a ward and not a voter. The reformers assumed guardianship at the end of the war. "As you were"—let everybody get back in his place and mind his own business. May America revive its old belief "In God we trust" and supplement it with the healthy philosophy of "Live and let live."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—IMMIGRATION

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD for six legislative days on the subject of immigration and related subjects.

Mr. NEWTON. Their own remarks?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Their own remarks.

Mr. SABATH. For the present, Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to object. I withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, there is a growing interest in immigration legislation. There is a well-defined sentiment that is strong and general throughout the country that immigration should be rigidly restricted.

I voted several years back for the Burnett immigration bill, which was one of the best bills up to that time on the subject, and which has done more, perhaps, for restricted immigration than any act as yet put on the books. I have voted for every restriction measure that has been put before the House since I have been a Member of Congress.

It has been my observation that the restrictionists are generally in favor of prohibition enforcement as well as strict immigration law enforcement, while on the other hand the counter group in Congress known as the antirestrictionists generally vote wet on the prohibition issues, and oppose any attempt at immigration restriction. There is a reason for this. What is the reason? I am going to leave the matter right here and leave this question to be answered by those who wish to think it over and see if they can figure out the reason.

MEXICAN IMMIGRATION

Through the laws as they now stand, enacted by those of us who believe in restriction measures with respect to immigration, the situation is in better shape than it has ever been, except gross abuses are taking place on the Canadian and Mexican borders. Hordes of undesirable immigrants from Mexico are coming into the United States. I have seen it stated that anywhere from 65,000 to 100,000 Mexicans are annually coming over the border into this country. As a rule they are not the better or higher-type Mexicans, but generally of the less desirable type, and in many cases the criminal and diseased element. Something must be done to stop this. Every one of those Mexican peons who come into this country compete in labor of some kind with American labor. Their standard of living is so far below that of the American standard it is impossible for American labor to compete in low wages with these peons, and the result is that every year in the border and other States where this Mexican immigration is absorbed anywhere from 40,000 to 60,000 Americans are run out of employment by them.

TAKING JOBS FROM AMERICAN LABORERS

This is an army of Americans to lose their jobs annually to peon laborers. It is a great hardship and is unfair. It is a condition that ought to be corrected as quickly as it can be done. When matters of this kind arise and the question is asked why it has not been stopped the answer generally is "we have not had sufficient funds." I believe Congress is ready to vote any amount that may be necessary to stop this undesirable swarm of pauper labor from Mexico. They are not as good labor as the American laboring men; in fact, the latter is the finest labor in the world and the most efficient.

DO NOT UNDERSTAND AMERICAN IDEALS

This ignorant and undesirable element pouring into the United States from Mexico, not only do not understand American ideals, but many of them come into our country with hatred in their hearts for America and Americans. Of course, there are many who are of the higher and better type, but at present there is no way of keeping either class of Mexicans out, as there is no adequate protection on the border. Who is to blame for this? What political party is in power and control of this Government, and had control of it for the last eight years? What are you going to do about it? The American people want to know. It is not of concern to the border States alone, but it is of keen concern to all the States and all the people of the country. Not only are these Mexican immigrants in competition with our own laboring men but the products of this pauper labor, whether on the farm or in factories, are in competition with the products of American laboring men, and it is being felt in many lines.

We can not afford to let this situation remain as it is. Congress should pass the Box bill and such other restriction measures as will effectively shut off the influx of this pauper labor and these undesirable immigrants, and Congress should appropriate all the money, regardless of amount, it will take to make effective the laws we enact.

ALWAYS A FIGHT ON IMMIGRATION LEGISLATION

Every time a restriction measure of any kind affecting immigration comes up on the floor of the House or the Senate there is a vigorous fight put up by the antirestrictionists, and generally it is argued that it will do no good and will not restrict immigration. Then why a fight on every bill and every move that looks to more rigid restriction of immigration?

POPULATION RAPIDLY INCREASING

Our population is rapidly increasing and our industries are growing, although they are not as prosperous as they should be. It has been estimated that in the United States there is a birth every 12 seconds, a death every 24 seconds, and that an immigrant enters the United States approximately every 3 minutes. It is estimated that some one emigrates from the United States about every 12 minutes. Assuming that these figures are approximately correct, it will be observed our population is rapidly increasing both in birth rate and by immigration. These figures relate to the legally admitted immigrants and not to those who slip in, as is being done on the Mexican border and elsewhere.

MUST NOT LET DOWN THE BARS

It is a mistake and has been proven so to in any manner let down the bars. To the contrary, we should keep up the bars and keep building the statutes stronger and tighter against undesirable and criminal elements, who will do us far more harm than good.

If they came here and assimilated our ideals, as some do, and become good law-respecting citizens it would be quite different, but we know from experience just what has taken place and it is our duty to be ever on guard. We can not afford to take chances. Our American institutions, bought by the blood of our fathers, are too sacred and dear to American hearts and too important to be sacrificed. Our deportation laws must be stricter and enforced more rigidly than in the past, that respect for and obedience to our laws may be properly had. We are told let's be fair and just. Agreed, let's be fair and just, but let it first be to America. Let's be just and fair to our own Republic and not poison her institutions with the riff-raff and scum of other countries who will not, and can not, from the very nature of things, become one of us because they have no conception of Americanism. The desirable and better type will be dealt fairly with, especially the intelligent and upright immigrants. They have always been dealt fairly and humanely with, and everyone knows that the fight has been against the vicious, undesirable, and criminal element that it is vastly to our welfare to keep out of this country.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the question of immigration is one of intense interest throughout the entire country. I believe that the people generally are better informed upon this question than upon any other subject which will come before Congress for consideration during the present session.

The World War aroused an interest in the study of foreign questions, and during the past few years the question of immigration has been the subject of debate in the schools throughout the country. It has been discussed from the pulpit, through the public press, in civic bodies, labor organizations, Legion posts, and has been the subject of individual investigations, so that the people have more information upon the subject and are better prepared to express themselves upon it than perhaps any other public question.

I voted for the Burnett immigration law in 1917 and also voted to pass it over the President's veto. I voted for the immigration act of 1924 and every amendatory act that has subsequently been reported to and considered by Congress.

We have up for consideration to-day three additional bills, which have for their purpose the strengthening of the immigration laws.

Senate bill 5094, known as the alien deportation act, is intended to strengthen the deportation provisions of the immigration laws, and it provides that aliens may be deported for certain additional offenses, as provided in the bill.

Another bill, H. R. 16296, provides for the admission of certain technical and skilled experts within the quotas. This does not increase the number who may be admitted under the quotas, but only provides that of those admitted preference be given to skilled experts in certain lines.

The third bill, known as the Box bill—H. R. 16927—is to clarify the 1924 immigration act relating to nonimmigrant aliens entering temporarily for business.

The reports of the Committee on Immigration go into the details of the respective bills and contain much valuable information and are helpful to the proper understanding of the provisions of these bills.

The immigration act of 1924 recognized the principles of the immigration law enacted in 1917 and the acts subsequently passed and supplemented and extended it, and none of the prior laws have been repealed, except where there is a conflict or it is specifically so provided in the act. All laws enacted subsequent to 1917 and 1924 are for the purpose of strengthening and not weakening our immigration laws.

Section 3 of the immigration act of 1917 is not repealed by the 1924 act but is continued in force, and enumerates in great detail the classes of aliens to be excluded from admission into the United States; and among them are idiots and insane persons, paupers, vagrants, persons afflicted with tuberculosis or with any loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, persons convicted of felony involving moral turpitude, polygamists, anarchists, or persons who are opposed to all forms of law or who are opposed to organized government and favor the assassination of public officials or the unlawful destruction of property, prostitutes, contract laborers, aliens over 16 years of age physically capable of reading who can not read the English or some other language, and many other classes enumerated in this section.

If this section were honestly, intelligently, sympathetically, and rigidly enforced, it would result in the rejection of many seeking admission to our country who are undesirable, and it would relieve from criticism in a large measure the foreigners who come to our country.

Everyone desirous of studying the immigration question should carefully read this section in order to appreciate the very great responsibility which is given to our immigration officials under this bill, first, to the consular officials abroad, and, second, to the immigration officials at home.

Those aliens who are not eligible to citizenship are excluded by the provisions of this bill and other acts of Congress, and this, of course, will exclude the Japanese, Chinese, and the yellow races of Asia. They can not be assimilated, are not in sympathy with our form of government, and should be excluded. These aliens will gradually spread to the interior. This is a very acute question now on the Pacific coast.

Immigrants, under the terms of the 1924 act, are divided into two classes, "quota" and "nonquota" immigrants.

First. "Quota" immigrants are composed of 100 persons plus 2 per cent of the nationals based upon the census of 1890; and Second. "Nonquota" immigrants, as defined in section 4.

That act provides for the admission as "quota immigrants" of 100 persons in addition to 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born individuals of such nationality who are now residents of the United States, based on the census of 1890. In other words, 100 persons may be admitted from any foreign country, and in addition thereto 2 per cent of the nationals from that country who were residents of the United States as shown by the census of 1890.

That law also provides—section 2—that the consular officials in foreign countries, under rules and regulations to be prescribed, may issue tentative immigration certificates up to but not to exceed the quota which it is provided may come from that country, and this certificate shall indicate the nationality, name, age, sex, race, and a sufficient personal description to identify the applicant, the date and place of his birth, and such additional information as may be prescribed by the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Labor, who has the administration of the act in charge. These certificates may be issued to "quota" and "nonquota" immigrants.

In addition to the quota immigrants the law provides—section 4—that there may be admitted in addition thereto as nonquota immigrants children under the age of 18, dependent parents over 55 years of age, husband or wife of a citizen of the United States, an immigrant previously admitted and who is returning to this country after a temporary visit abroad, and one who has continuously resided for the past 10 years in Canada, Newfoundland, Mexico, Cuba, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, the Canal Zone, or islands adjacent to the American continents, an immigrant who continuously for the past two years preceding the time of his application to enter the United States has been, and who seeks to enter this country solely for the purpose of, carrying on the vocation of minister of any religious denomination or professor of a college or university, an immigrant who is a skilled laborer, and students who desire to enter college and universities for the purpose of study.

Based upon the census of 1890, it is estimated that the maximum number of immigrants admitted annually would not exceed the total of 161,184.

By basing the admissions upon the census of 1890 and reducing the percentage from 3 to 2 the number of immigrants to be admitted will be very greatly reduced.

I favored a further reduction of the "quota" immigrants, either by basing the admissions upon an earlier census than that of 1890 or by reducing the percentage from 2 to 1. However, it is stated that no census prior to 1890 can be used as a basis for the reason that the nationality of immigrants is not shown.

There were admitted during 1923, 522,919 immigrants, whereas, under the provisions of this law, there will be admitted 161,184 immigrants.

During the six months before enactment of the 1924 law there were 469,000 immigrants admitted into the United States.

The number of immigrants admitted to our country during the more than a century of our Government is a very interesting study. Prior to 1842 the number did not reach 100,000 in any one year. In 1842, 104,565 were admitted. In 1865 the number reached 459,803. The largest number admitted during any one year was that of 1907, when 1,285,349 were received, and more than a million came to our country in the years 1905, 1906, 1907, 1910, 1913, and 1914. Since the World War a new tide of immigration started and in 1921 805,228 immigrants were admitted, but the number was reduced the following year by the acts of May 19, 1921, and of May 11, 1922. From September 30, 1820, up to and including June 30, 1923, 35,292,506 immigrants were admitted to our shores.

In order to get away from Old World conditions, unless immigration is restricted as by the terms of this bill, we may expect a much larger influx of immigrants. The period of depression, unstable conditions, militarism, the love of political liberty, and religious freedom will greatly stimulate immigration from Europe.

The 1924 law restricts immigration to those persons eligible to citizenship in the United States, and it is the purpose of the bill to reduce the number to those who can be assimilated. Every immigrant permanently admitted to our country should be carefully examined, and none should be admitted except those who desire to and will become useful, productive, and patriotic citizens of the United States.

In considering that bill many questions were important. Immigration is a domestic question and one for congressional legislation. We have a right to determine how many immigrants may or may not be admitted from any country. We may admit from one country or class and not from another.

In certain congested centers the percentage of foreign born is very high. The questions of assimilation, of education, of illiteracy, of teaching them the English language, of finding employment, of not displacing other labor, and many other questions go to make up the problem to be solved in considering immigration.

It is imperative that we do not admit those who would make undesirable citizens or those who are ineligible to become citizens or those who could not be assimilated.

The American Legion, at its annual convention in San Francisco in October, 1923, adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Congress be urged to permanently deny admission hereafter, as immigrants or permanent residents, to all aliens who are ineligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States.

The American Federation of Labor, in October, 1923, at Portland, Oreg., in its annual convention, adopted the following resolution:

We recommend that the executive council be instructed to advocate before the Sixty-eighth Congress a more stringent immigration policy under which immigration shall be curtailed below the present quotas.

The American Farm Bureau Federation passed a resolution in Chicago on December 12, 1923, as follows:

We favor a limitation of the number of immigrants permitted to enter this country to approximately the present total. We would shift the basis upon which the percentage is determined from 1910 to 1890, or an earlier period. We recommend that all immigrants be selected after physical, mental, and other tests in the land of their nativity by representatives of our Government, and that the Congress take proper steps to put such plan into operation.

It will be noted that the persons to be admitted, embodied in the 1924 law, follow very closely the number recommended to be admitted in the above resolution.

The National Grange, November 14–24, 1923, at Pittsburgh, adopted the following resolution at its annual meeting:

The grange favors immigration laws which will make for more loyal Americanism and better citizenship, and urges such modifications of the present laws as will accomplish this end. We favor the substitution of the census of 1890 for the census of 1910 as the basis for the percentage immigration law should it be reenacted. We reiterate the previous action of the grange asking for denial of permanent residence in the United States to aliens ineligible to citizenship.

The above resolution indorses the substitution of the 1890 census for the census of 1910. In addition, various civic organizations and patriotic societies, chambers of commerce, and Daughters of the American Revolution have passed resolutions favoring a further restriction of immigration and for the weeding out of the undesirables, and the selection of a better class of immigrants who would be eligible for citizenship when admitted and who could be assimilated into our body politic.

While I am not a member of the committee, and have not had the time to carefully read all of the hearings and the arguments used before the committee, I favor a reduction in the number of immigrants to be admitted and a selective system by the issuance of tentative certificates in foreign countries, with a final determination by our more responsible officials in this country, so that the number of immigrants will be greatly reduced and confined to those eligible to citizenship in this country and those who will be in sympathy with our Constitution and laws and those who can be readily assimilated. We have had many people of foreign birth who have added greatly to our citizenship. We must not overlook the splendid record they have made. We are not unmindful of the fact that in almost every Cabinet, from the days of Washington down to the present time, some member thereof has been of foreign birth.

However, in these days following the World War, when conditions abroad are so disturbed, we must give great care to a proper selection of those who are admitted to our shores, seeing to it that no undesirable foreigners are admitted who will be a menace to our institutions, who can not be readily assimilated, and who will be a burden and not a help to the communities in which they will reside. The 1924 law, under the nonquota section—4—admits the minor children, wives, or husbands, or the dependent parents over 55 years of age of those foreigners who have been previously admitted, and grants to them the privileges of citizenship in this country, so that there will be no hardship upon them; and in our selection of new immigrants we have provided for tentative certificates to be first issued abroad, so that prospective immigrants may not be admitted if they are not entitled to enter. We agree with the sentiment that no immigrant should be admitted to this country whom we would not welcome as a citizen of our State and Nation. This is our own beloved country; let us protect the fundamentals upon which it was founded as we would guard the purity of our own homes.

Under the 1924 law, after July 1, 1929, there will be admitted 150,000 immigrants of the quota class, and it is estimated that, including the nonquota aliens to be admitted, that the number to come in will not exceed 165,000.

There is much confusion in the figures given out by the Commissioner of Immigration as to the number actually admitted to this country. The quota class does not apply to Canada or to Mexico. Immigrants from these countries come in under the restrictive provisions of the act of 1917, as subsequently amended. Very large numbers come in from both of these countries. It has been found difficult to adequately patrol both borders. We need additional legislation as to both countries, and particularly against admissions through Mexico. Mexican laborers come here in competition with American workmen, and those who come in from that country are less desirable citizens. I would place both Canada and Mexico within the quota provisions of the immigration act, increase the appropriations to patrol these two borders, and strengthen the law with reference to those legally admitted with identification cards, so that those not found in possession of them may be the more easily detected and deported. The importance of this may be readily appreciated when it is known that as many foreigners come into our country illegally or surreptitiously from Mexico and Canada as are admitted from all European countries.

PERMISSION TO PRINT AMENDMENT IN RECORD

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that an amendment to the pending bill which I sent to the Clerk's desk during its consideration to-day, but which was not reported, may be printed in the RECORD for the day.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, is that the amendment with respect to the bootleggers?

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman is correctly informed.

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. TYSON. I present a resolution adopted at the January term of the Knox County (Tenn.) quarterly court, relative to the location of a summer home for the President of the United States, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the Knox County court, conditions come and go, likewise suggestions that are often made by both high officials and sometimes humble citizens, that have a great deal of merit, but neither the press or the public become impressed or interested and unless the individual making such suggestion is so wedded to the idea to keep it before the public it will soon be forgotten.

This preamble is to get you members to become interested in what I am going to suggest and present to you.

Mr. Chairman and members of the court, some days ago I saw and read a suggestion from the President of the United States, Calvin Coolidge, that the Government should build a permanent summer and rest home for the President. Since that suggestion I have not seen, heard, or read a word of comment; yet it impressed me so deeply that I have thought the idea was one of the wisest suggestions made by a President in times of peace for a public improvement or necessity. President Coolidge frankly, wisely, and truthfully stated the facts, and that he could recommend a permanent summer home for the President of the United States without any selfish motive.

He stated that the altitude at Washington was virtually sea level and when the President took an outing on the ocean it was virtually the same altitude, and it did not give the rest and vigor that was needed. I was very much interested and very deeply impressed with the remarks of the President suggesting a permanent out-of-Washington home to be known as The President's Summer Home. With his suggestions carried out, it would forever eliminate the annoyance of the President selecting a palace or cottage donated by some kind citizen where he will spend his vacation. The Government has always maintained the President's Mansion, known as the White House, ever since the founding of our present Capital. Now, to think we have 48 States and not a place provided where the President can go for rest and recreation—such a condition should no longer exist.

At the present time it is more difficult for the President to decide where he is going to spend his vacation than it is whether he will approve or veto a tariff bill.

There are two questions for Congress to consider. First, should there be an isolated home for the President of the United States, where he can go for a rest as well as being isolated from disturbing elements, and where he may be given undisturbed time in the preparation of very important messages to be submitted to Congress?

The second question, If we are going to have a President's summer and rest home, where shall it be located? It seems such a home should be located on a Government domain and as close and accessible to Washington as possible to get the altitude needed, as suggested by President Coolidge.

Mr. Chairman and members of the court, I do not hesitate to suggest that no other place on the map of our lands could be more ideal for the location of such a home than on the lands of the Great Smoky Mountain National Park. Altitude just right, climate finest of the fine, mountain springs pure as melted snow, the foliage of millions of trees and shrubs, 137 species, with more tints and colors and more gorgeous than could be found in an art gallery. The autumn presented by Old Smoky is the most beautiful picture painted by the hand of nature. Five hundred and sixty-five varieties of wild flowers permeating the air with fragrance. The sweetest of all nature.

This is where we suggest that a summer home be located, a rest resort for a tired and overworked President; where he can dwell and live with nature and enjoy the blessings of an undisturbed day. And when he becomes tired in body he can go to the many tops of Old Smoky and there see the sun of day come riding in on the waves of the Atlantic and emerging through the foliage of the forest dripping with the honeydew of the morning, spreading the smiles of day and kissing with unfelt lips the slumbering and God-loving people whom He has loved and protected through the night from their visions of beauty and dreams of excitement to a day of happiness and joy; and with the dawn of the morning embark on the lap of nature to enjoy the laughter of the day's journey; and from the smiles of the morning to the laughter of the evening behold the most beautiful panorama view stretching from the incoming waves of the Atlantic to the banks of the Father of Waters—the greatest commercial-carrying stream of the world. And at the end of day dip the torch of light into the bosom of the great Mississippi and there pronounce to his people a benediction—sweet visions and dreams. This is the place beneath these trees in the cluster of these shrubs, surrounded by these wild flowers and enrapt with the honeysuckle of fragrance and under the shadows of Old Smoky, where he can enjoy the wild life of the mountains, the developed life of the valleys, surrounded with the protection of a people devoted to liberty, freedom, and peace: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we memorialize Congress through our Senators and Representatives to assist in carrying out President Coolidge's suggestion, and then to have said home located in the Smoky Mountain National Park.

Respectfully submitted.

SAM HARRISON,
Justice of the Peace,
Second District, Knox County, Tenn.

STATE OF TENNESSEE,
County of Knox, ss:

I, L. M. Kennedy, clerk of the county court for the aforesaid county, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and perfect copy of the resolution unanimously adopted at the January term of the Knox County quarterly court, in re: The location of a summer home for the President of the United States, as the same appears of record in my office.

Witness my hand and official seal in Knoxville, Tenn., this 17th day of January, 1929.

[SEAL.] L. M. KENNEDY,
Clerk of the County Court.

Mr. FESS presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Senate joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to distribute radio-broadcasting facilities equitably in accordance with the population of the States

Whereas under General Order No. 40, issued by the Federal Radio Commission on August 30, 1928, and subsequent orders assigning frequencies, powers, licenses, and hours of operation to the broadcasting stations of the United States, Ohio did not receive its equitable share of these facilities in accordance with the letter and spirit of the Davis amendment; and

Whereas the inequalities and injustice which have resulted from the reallocation as promulgated by the Federal Radio Commission are the results of using the arbitrary radio zones of the 1927 act as the basis; and

Whereas no equitable distribution of broadcasting facilities, serving public interest, convenience, and necessity can be brought about so long as equal division among the five arbitrary zones is adhered to: Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to amend the Federal radio law so as to distribute broadcasting facilities equitably in accordance with the population of the States; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to both of the United States Senators and each Member of Congress from Ohio.

Mr. WARREN presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Enrolled Joint Memorial 1, Senate, Twentieth Legislature of the State of Wyoming, petitioning the Department of Agriculture of the Government of the United States to open certain lands in the Teton National Forest, in Teton County, Wyo., for the purpose of sheep grazing

Whereas considerably more than 75 per cent of the area of Teton County, Wyo., is embraced within the boundaries of the Teton National Forest and is, therefore, under the administration of the Government of the United States;

Whereas by far the most and better part of the grazing lands of said county are within the boundaries of said national forest, and sheep belonging to the citizens and residents of said county are now by departmental regulation excluded from said forest;

Whereas the citizens and residents of Teton County are thus deprived of the advantages which were enjoyed by the pioneers and settlers of other counties and States to whom the public domain was and is open for the grazing of livestock, and, since they are dependent for their livelihood upon the livestock industry, said citizens and residents of Teton County are consequently suffering a great hardship by reason of the said exclusion of sheep from the said forest;

Whereas the county of Teton and the State of Wyoming are deprived by the said policy of exclusion of a considerable income that would normally be derived from the taxation of largely increased bands of sheep if grazing were permitted in said forest;

Whereas the tract of land hereinafter described offers abundant forage suitable for sheep but not suitable for cattle owing to the presence of larkspur which is poisonous to cattle but nutritious for sheep;

Whereas the opening of said tract would provide a profitable use, in wintering sheep, for the large annual hay crop, grown on said lands, for which there is no present market; and

Whereas the said tract is not now used by elk or game, nor in any manner by tourists, visitors, or campers, being suitable only for sheep: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Twentieth Wyoming Legislature (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Department of Agriculture of the United States Government be, and it is hereby, most earnestly requested to open the following described tract of land for the grazing of sheep under the rules and regulations of the United States Bureau of Forestry:

All of that portion of the Teton National Forest lying within the boundaries of Teton County, Wyo., south of the south line of Range 42, Wyoming, or its projection westward, and west of the Snake River; Be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this memorial be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Chief Forester of the United States, to each member of the Wyoming delegation in the Congress of the United States, and to the Honorable Vincent Carter, Representative elect.

FRANK O. HORTON,
President of the Senate.
MARVIN L. BISHOP, Jr.,
Speaker of the House.

Approved at 10.54 p. m., February 11, 1929.

FRANK C. EMERSON,
Governor.

Mr. BURTON presented the petition of sundry calf-leather workers of Girard, Ohio, and vicinity, praying for the imposition of a fair tariff duty on imports of finished leather, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented petitions of sundry members of the parent-teachers' associations of Jonesboro and Arkadelphia, in the State of Arkansas, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 1584) to create a Federal department of education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from W. G. Bate, of Stevens Point, Wis., praying that a route for a new Isthmian canal be selected about 30 miles east of the Panama Canal, from the Gulf of San Blas on the Atlantic side to the Bayana River on the Pacific side, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

PROPOSED TARIFF REVISION

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I clipped from the Washington Post this morning an editorial from the Philadelphia Public Ledger, presumably of yesterday, stating that the revision of the tariff to take place at the ensuing special session will not be confined to the agricultural schedule, but will be general, and that there will be a general revision upward notwithstanding the views supposed to be entertained by the President elect, Mr. Hoover. The dictatorial character of the editorial is interesting, to say the least. Verily, Mr. President, the hand is the hand of the Public Ledger, but the voice is the voice of Grundy. I ask that the editorial may be incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted. The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Saturday, February 16, 1929]

REAL TARIFF REVISION DEMANDED

There was in Washington a few days ago much talk that there would be no general tariff revision at the coming special session of Congress. It was said textiles might be given a little help. Possibly steel would be aided. Here and there a schedule would be touched up a bit. The farm schedules would be rewritten. The farmers would be given any and every thing they wanted, as they were in the emergency tariff of 1921 and the tariff act of 1922.

But—in the main there was to be no general revision. The theory was that all sweeping changes would wait until the next regular session. There were emphatic intimations that Mr. Hoover wanted to wait. These were strengthened when Senator SMOOT came back from Miami Beach declaring he was opposed to any complete revision.

There is not so much of that talk now. The House Ways and Means Committee is settling the question of whether revision shall be partial or general. It has been in session for weeks. Hundreds of manufacturers have appeared at its hearings. They have shown it is a condition and not a theory that confronts American industry. They have told their story, and the burden thereof is that of insufficient protection against a reviving and vigorous Europe and an ambitious and pushing Orient.

These hearings covered the tariff schedule by schedule. Any doubts that did exist about the necessity of a genuine revision have been swept away.

On or about March 10 the House committee will begin writing the new tariff. This will be ready about May 1. The trend of that measure may now be forecast in a general way.

Changes will not be confined to farm and textile schedules. Not all rates will be lifted, but most of them will be raised. Where an industry is suffering from the pressure of foreign competition it will get further protection.

It is probable that a few articles will vanish from the free list. When revisions are made they will be upward. Practically every schedule will be opened for the changes that the last six years have shown as necessary or imperative.

The revisions proposed are described as "conservative," except in the farm schedules. They may be too "conservative" for the Senate, which is more likely to raise than it is to lower them.

Instead of merely tinkering with the tariff the House committee will offer a new tariff law. Its hearings have shown the stark necessity of action.

Mr. Hoover may wish to wait a while, but the country is not willing. Genuine revision is expected as soon as this can be made. The Republican Party is pledged to it. Protection was its leading issue in 1928. The incoming administration is bound by the pledges made last year, and the Seventieth Congress was chosen upon the question of genuine protection.

This is understood by Congress, and particularly by the House Ways and Means Committee. Its duty is to revise the tariff wherever, in its judgment, changes are necessary. That it is preparing to do. If the special session meets on or about April 15, the committee will have a measure ready within two weeks after it convenes.

And if and when the schedules are opened, revision will be general rather than piecemeal. That is what the country expected as soon as the results of the election of last November were known. It is what both industry and the country assumed would be done. In preparing a bill revising rates generally upward the House committee is carrying out the mandate so clearly expressed in November, 1928. (Philadelphia Public Ledger.)

THE AMERICAN FLAG

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have received quite a number of letters recently supporting my position on the flag amendment which I offered to the cruiser bill. I send four of them to the clerk's desk and ask that they may be read in my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE COLLEGE, PA., February 7, 1929.

Senator HEFLIN, OF ALABAMA.

MY DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: In to-day's Philadelphia Inquirer, on the front page, is a news story of the achievement of recognition as a temporal state by the Vatican.

On the back page of the financial section of the same paper is the story of your speech advocating its proper place on our ships for our flag.

You will probably receive thousands of letters commending you upon, and thanking you for, that speech; nevertheless, I wish to add my word of most sincere gratitude and appreciation for your fearlessness and watchfulness.

As a very humble student of our history, I have a feeling that the two news items are the harbingers—even though long ahead in time—of a deadly struggle over the principle of independence of church and state. Protestantism has fought its way free once, and, given a few people like yourself to keep attention focused on threatening dangers, we should be able to keep free.

Again I wish to thank you for your fine, sound American stand on all matters of national policy.

Cordially and respectfully yours,

(Miss) GERTRUDE MASON ADAMS.

READING, PA., February 10, 1929.

Hon. J. THOS. HEFLIN.

DEAR BROTHER AMERICAN: I want to express my appreciation to you for the good work you are doing, and have been doing for years, in behalf of our beloved America.

I hope that every word you speak may sink into the hearts of all who hear you and those who read them, and that your work will bear fruit to the protection and preservation and honor of our country and its principles, the things our earliest forefathers wove into the fiber of this land by much labor and sacrifice and prayer.

To my mind our country has never been in greater danger than it is now. Our past troubles have largely been of temporal and material things, but the present danger threatens the very deepest and most essential attribute that has helped to make America the most honorable of all lands.

The fact that the foes are so insidious makes them extremely dangerous. They use the press and the stage at every opportunity to glorify the priest and humiliate the Protestant minister.

If only our people can be aroused in time. It is disgusting to those of us whose ancestors have been American born for centuries and who have been pioneers in making our country what it is to be asked to step aside now that the hard work is done and let aliens of a few years' residence dominate us.

We live in the Keystone State and are of a different political faith than yours, but at heart you and we are Americans, with the same hopes and fears and allegiance. The last election has made us very proud of the South. She saved the day, God bless her.

Let us ever honor the admonition of Washington to put none but Americans on guard, and heed the words of his Farewell Address, "Beware of foreign influence, one of the most baneful foes of our Government." Let us all stand on Jeffersonian principles. One of Roosevelt's last sayings was, "Carry on." May true Americans of every class and clan carry on; and may God in His mercy and power bless our efforts and grant us victory and deliverance from every foe.

Yours for America,

Mr. and Mrs. HARRY T. MILLER,
335 North Front Street, Reading, Pa.

BANGOR, ME., February 8, 1929.

Senator THOMAS J. HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Have read the press accounts of your efforts to have the practice suppressed of flying the Roman Catholic Church flag above the Stars and Stripes.

I went over to France for that dear old flag, and though I be but an humble individual, your efforts have my entire approval and moral support.

I only hope you will carry the fight to the country at large.

Yours truly,

WALTER A. PALMER,
Box 1, R. F. D. 3, Bangor, Me.

FEBRUARY 9, 1929.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Just wish to commend you for your recent speech in the Senate concerning the United States flag. We are proud of "our Tom" and are with you and Alabama is for you. Clipping is from the Montgomery Advertiser—the dirtiest sheet in the United States.

Best wishes to you.

Yours truly,

G. W. LAWRENCE,
493 Martha Street, Montgomery, Ala.

Mr. HEFLIN. There is one more letter which I wish to have read in my time, which came to me from a retired naval officer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 9, 1929.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: Confirming our conversation, I have to say that I entered the Naval Academy in 1887. As late as that and a few years thereafter I do not believe it was the universal and traditional practice or requirement on board vessels of the Navy, during divine service, to partially lower the national flag and display the Navy church pennant above the national flag. The above may have been the custom on some vessels, but, also, it is my recollection that on some vessels this was not done, and during divine service on board the national flag remained at the peak or flagstaff and the church pennant was also conspicuously displayed. I think the present specific requirement was placed in the signal instructions in the nineties.

In my opinion, reverence for Almighty God does not require the partial lowering of the national colors and the placing of the church pennant above. Honor and respect on national anniversaries and other occasions of honor, respect, or reverence, require the national flag when displayed to be displayed with no other flag above it, and such display of the national flag is in itself a mark of honor and respect in such observance. It does not appear to me that any other display of the national flag would be an equal mark of honor or respect for the occasion or for the national flag.

By decision of the Supreme Court, the United States is a Christian Nation. I do not believe any nation—and I have visited many of them—worships God more truly or more devoutly than does the United States of America, but in order that we may know just what is required of us in order to show proper respect and reverence when we acknowledge God our Supreme Being in the Senate and House of Representatives—that is, during the invocation there—I might ask that an amendment be offered to some bill, and such an amendment should be germane to any bill, that the national flags flown above the Senate and House Chambers be partially lowered and that the church pennant be displayed above the national flags above referred to during such invocations.

The national colors on a man-of-war or anywhere else is an emblem of the state. Let church—the church, any church, and all churches—remain separate.

Very sincerely,

B. B. BIERER,
Captain, United States Navy, Retired.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD, following the letters just read, other letters which I have on my desk. This batch contains a sample of a vast number of letters received from Alabama and other States. I will just print a few of them now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SACKETT in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

528 EAST MAIN STREET,
Schuylkill Haven, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Kindly mail me a copy of your speech delivered in the Senate on February 6, 1929, on to prevent the flying of a chaplain's flag above the American emblem on battleships during church services at sea. Keep the good work going. We 100 per cent Americans like you at Washington. If you have a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD left for February 6, 1929, mail me one.

Yours truly,

RAYMOND C. ROEDER.

ATHENS, ALA., February 9, 1929.

Hon. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Have read with pleasure in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what you had to say in regard to the flag on our ships.

Mighty proud to know we have one man in the Senate who is not afraid of Rome. Keep the fight up. You have thousands of admirers.

I just wonder since the Pope has been restored to temporal power what will be the stand of those Senators who opposed you in regard to a foreign ruler's flag floating above the Stars and Stripes. In fact, how can that flag be there at all now since he is a civil ruler?

Very truly,

JOHN HAYES.

JOHNSON COUNTY KLAN NO. 82, REALM OF INDIANA,
Franklin, Ind., February 11, 1929.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Johnson County Klan No. 82, and the Woman's Klan No. 7, voted unanimously to send letters of indorsement and congratulations to you and the 10 men of the Senate for the stand to uphold our flag regulations, that no banner or emblem be placed above it.

We are wondering how our Indiana Senators happened to be off duty at that time and place.

Very respectfully,

COMMITTEE,
J. V. DEER, Chairman.

PORTLAND, OREG., February 7, 1929.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senator from Alabama.

DEAR MR. HEFLIN: I have noticed your wonderful efforts upon the floor of the United States Senate to have the papal rag placed below the American flag. God bless you; stay with this idea until you accomplish your undertaking.

Continue to take the hide off the "Pope's tools" and stretch it over the peninsula of Maryland where the gulls can roost on it.

I have my ear close to the ground in my own little environment and everything you say is O. K'd by all true Americans. Some sleepy "Protestants" haven't awoke as yet. * * * They are a hindrance to the great American cause.

Please hold to your great courage, stay right at the helm, and steer the old ship of state where she belongs. I am confident you are swamped with letters and telegrams of encouragement for your wonderful work. May I have a copy of your speech of the last two days on the floor of the Senate referring to the papal rag above the American flag on our Navy? Thanking you and wishing the best there is on this earth for good men like you, I beg to remain,

Very truly yours,

E. A. EASLEY,
295 Montgomery Street, Corner Fifth.

WAYCROSS, GA., February 9, 1929.

Hon. THOMAS J. HEFLIN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The members of Waycross (Ga.) Klan No. 78, in konklave assembled Thursday evening, February 7, 1929, extend to you a rising vote of thanks and appreciation for the fight you are making, and especially the speech you made Wednesday, February 7, before the Senate.

We have so few public men who are willing to fight Rome, and we want you to know that while you are making your fight we are with you and that we feel that it is going to take men of your courage and convictions to stay the hand of the Harlot of the Tiber in these United States of America.

May the God of Justice give you strength to "carry on" and help you to be prepared every time the monster raises its head to give such argument as will convince and awaken our people from their slumber is our prayer for you and for those who are standing by your side.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: It was John C. Calhoun, I believe, who said:

"I know but one road to political success, my duty, and where that path leads me I shall follow though I go alone." He, in my humble opinion, was exactly right in this, as well as other things.

* * * I am, indeed, delighted to say a word in commendation of the stand you are now taking.

Do what you believe to be right, even though you "go alone."

With kindest regards, I remain

Yours fraternally,

HOWARD LLOYD, Chevy Chase, D. C.

MIDDLETOWN, DEL., February 7, 1929.

Senator THOMAS J. HEFLIN.

HONORABLE SIR: Thanks for your efforts to keep the papal flag where it belongs. A Protestant flag would put God at the head of our Nation, too. Neither should be above our national emblem, if we would keep church and state separate.

We will fight the fight to the bitter end.

Yours in unfailing bond,

G. HARRY DAVIDSON.

NEW YORK CITY, February 7, 1929.

Hon. THOMAS J. HEFLIN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: I have read with much interest your speeches on the flag incident and trust that you will keep up your fight against the Senators who failed to support your amendment to the cruiser bill.

The news from Rome this morning should furnish you with material for further action on your part in defense of the flag.

Is the world coming back to a medieval status? I should not be surprised to see the inquisition revived in Italy during the "reign" of the dictator—Mussolini.

Yours sincerely,

EDWARD BARNES,

Mr. J. T. HEFLIN,
United States Senator.

DEAR SIR AND FOREMOST AMERICAN: I have followed your words of wisdom for a long time. * * * You have taken the right stand on the flag question, the Stars and Stripes above all others. I congratulate you on your noble stand for Americanism.

May God bless and keep you.

Truly yours, JOHN M. SCHRICKER.

FAIRFIELD, ALA., February 8, 1929.

Hon. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We Americans who want America for Americans are proud of you and Senator BLACK.

Keep a bold front and work for your country and its people.

The foreign element has grown so strong in this country while its people have been tolerant until it has gotten to where they attack you whenever you try to pass any law that will benefit Americans.

It is getting to where an American can't get work around the big shops for the foreign element, and they are not all Catholics that are working against us.

Best wishes to you and all our true-blue American Senators.

Yours truly,

HARRY H. PHILLIPS,
649 Maple Street.

P. S.—You can always count on me for support.

FEBRUARY 9, 1929.

Senator THOMAS J. HEFLIN,
Congress Hall, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I thank God for a man like you in the Senate.

What is the trouble when Protestant Senators, elected by the Protestant votes, quake at the rustle of priestly robes and hasten to do their bidding? I sincerely hope that your prediction to the effect that they will be replaced in the Senate by loyal Protestant men will come true.

Those Protestant Senators who voted "nay" on your American flag amendment on Tuesday deserve the everlasting scorn of their constituents, who have every right to expect that their best interests will be protected within that august body.

Senator ———'s remarks on the subject were particularly obnoxious to me, and in view of which I wrote him a letter expressing my opinion of his stand in no uncertain terms, a copy of which I inclose herewith.

I am happy to take sides with you and can say "amen" to every statement you have made in your fight for the absolute supremacy of the American flag within our own domain.

Very respectfully,

ALLEN F. TITUS,
Quartermaster Sergeant, United States Marine Corps,
1100 South Broad Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: Portsmouth Council, No. 38, of the Junior Order United American Mechanics, wishes to extend to you their most hearty congratulations and appreciation on your stand in behalf of the American flag. We feel that we have at least one 100 per cent American in the Senate that is not afraid to defend our flag when abused.

Wishing you the best of success, I beg to remain,

ROX, PA., February 7, 1929.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,

DEAR SIR: I am writing you these few lines to congratulate you on the way you spoke on the flag question in the Senate.

There need be no flag flying over the Stars and Stripes.

We know God is over all the Nation, for He made it, and we need no emblem to show it, and there are millions of others who think the same way.

God bless and keep you.

Yours very truly,

DEAR SIR: Reading in the daily papers of your bill to prevent the hoisting of the chaplain's flag with the "Roman cross" above the Stars and Stripes, I wish to say the boys in Auburn are with you to a man.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to congratulate you upon the introduction of your amendment to the cruiser bill, in reference to the papal flag being flown above Old Glory on our ships.

I think our American flag is sufficient to be flown during religious services as it stands for God, home, and native land.

I wish we had more such sturdy Protestant gentlemen as you in the United States Senate.

Yours,

MALVERN E. FUHS.

HOLDREGE, NEBR., February 9, 1929.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have followed you on your flag amendment of last Tuesday and Wednesday, and wish to say that I am surprised at the number of Senators that voted against it. But I think you stated the facts to that body Wednesday in your speech.

There are a great many people out here in Nebraska that are for you and your flag amendment.

* * * * * * *

Again I want to congratulate you on the fight you are putting up against political Romanism.

Very sincerely yours,

M. L. HAUSNER.

DEAR SIR: Would it be possible for you to send me one or two copies of your addresses given before the Senate last week?

I have read with interest what the newspapers say you said and would like to know just what you did say. I have found that they don't always tell the whole story.

Thanking you, I remain, yours truly,

LEON E. NEVERS,
40 West Terrace Street.

SOMERVILLE, IND., February 11, 1929.

DEAR SENATOR: I just had to send you a few words of congratulations on your brave stand for America and the Protestant cause.

I was just reading a Catholic-owned newspaper's account of your amendment to the cruiser bill. These accounts, as you know, were just ridicule.

I don't think the good people of Indiana will soon forget how our own Senators stood on this.

I would like to have the names of the Senators who voted with you, as I have failed to find it in any paper.

If it is possible, I would be glad to get the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the time your amendment was in discussion. Just keep up the good work. You are the only one who has the nerve.

Yours for great success,

ROY GREEN, Somerville, Ind.

Senator HEFLIN, of Alabama,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I can not refrain from sending you a few lines of congratulation on your stand in connection with the flag of the Catholic Church floating above the American flag.

Do not give up your fight. Millions of American citizens are with you, even though they may not be members of the Ku-Klux Klan.

I am well acquainted with the aims and purposes of the Roman Church, having spent my life in social and religious work among people coming from foreign lands to this country, bringing with them a bigoted adherence to a religion and civilization which is anything but American. I am of foreign extraction and have known intimately the workings of the Papal Church and what it has accomplished in Catholic countries.

We must fight that church in this country, and you are a man who dares to do it. Your followers will back you up in your effort.

Yours very truly,

B. K. BASHO.

MASONVILLE, N. J., February 6, 1929.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Senator from Alabama, Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Permit me, as a humble American citizen, the son of an American citizen, and the grandson of an American citizen, the latter having served the Stars and Stripes as a marine in the sixties, I having served my country to the best of my ability in the World War, to offer you a humble but sincere word of appreciation and encouragement in your endeavors to guard our great, united Nation from the influences of a foreign politico-religious organization.

Your great work, while bringing down upon your head the wrath of Rome, has been of undeterminable influence upon those Americans who through indifference and carelessness have not been as watchful as were our forefathers, who guarded closely the institutions which they founded by their sweat and blood.

We in New Jersey who are not aligned with the forces of alienism are in a hopeless minority, but we can applaud the representative of the great Commonwealth of Alabama for his courageous convictions and heroic actions while deploring and condemning the actions of the representatives of our own Commonwealth.

Therefore the grandson of a "Yankee" who bore arms in the sixties, and who himself bore arms in 1917 in common with the grandsons of Lee, extends to you, sir, the appreciation of an American who admires real courage, such as it takes to espouse the cause of real Americanism against the wiles and intrigues of such a master organization as the Romanist movement.

May you live long to continue such service, and may your voice ever be raised in opposition to anything not strictly 100 per cent American, and when the time shall have arrived whereby you will no longer be able to do so, may the sovereign State of Alabama raise up another of similar caliber, and may you find that peace, contentment, and happiness which always comes to him who has done his duty faithfully and well, and who is conscious of that fact.

It has been my pleasure to listen to addresses which you have made—once in the Senate and once or twice at gatherings of patriotic citizens—and I have been convinced that a man who fears not the wrath of either Rome or Tammany is the kind of man worthy of the confidence and esteem of all good citizens, and therefore we, the honest citizenry of New Jersey, feel that our sister Commonwealth of Alabama made no mistake in its choice of Senator, and wish we could say as much for our own State.

With the constant prayer that the Almighty will continue to be with you and that your efforts to free our Nation from Romanist intrigues will be unceasing, I am,

Sincerely and respectfully yours,

R. C. BOUGHER,
P. O. Box 215, Maine Highway.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., February 7, 1929.

Hon. Senator HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.:

I am writing you to let you know that I have appreciated beyond words the brave and gallant fight you made for the flag, Protestantism, and America; and while you were laughed at by some in the United States Senate, millions of patriots throughout the Nation lisped your name in prayer that same night. You will have their scalps hanging at your belt in less than one year from now. The American public is with you.

Hon. Senator HEFLIN,

MY DEAR SIR: I read with interest your speech in the Senate protesting against the flying of a papal flag above the Stars and Stripes, and I want to write you these few lines expressing my appreciation and my admiration for your stand in this matter and for the 10 other gentlemen who stood with you. And should you put this issue up to the country through the States, I pledge you my support. I am only a hotel

Hon. Senator HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HEFLIN: I wish to thank you very kindly for your brave and noble work you are doing. I deeply regret and feel sorry for you when you are attacked so unjustly on the Senate floor.

Mr. HEFLIN, I certainly admire you for your brave stand and also the way you are able to defend yourself against men that ought to have more brains and character than they have shown. You show that you are capable of handling any situation that may arise on the Senate floor.

Remember, Mr. HEFLIN, all great leaders, especially men that have exposed Rome's plot, have always been fiercely attacked throughout the world's history, so naturally a great man like you makes no exceptions. Pay no attention and don't lose any sleep over what some tools of Rome may say. * * * I for one will follow your advice and start early enough before the next election of Senators and Representatives and do my part in throwing some of them out of office.

* * * Although thousands upon thousands of people are thankful for your noble work, I don't imagine there are many that think letting you know how thankful they are.

May good health and happiness be yours in years to come, and may you some day be richly rewarded for your Christian work in defending this Protestant Nation from the evil forces. May God be with you.

Very sincerely yours,

ONE OF THE MANY ADMIRERS YOU HAVE,

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of the above council held February 11, 1929, an article under date of February 7, pertaining to an address you made in the United States Senate, concerning the flying of flags above the American flag during religious services on board Navy vessels, was read and I, as secretary, was instructed to write you commending your stand and reminding you of your promise to introduce a bill forbidding the flying of "any flag" above the "American flag."

Again commending you on your stand, we, the brothers of above council, remain,

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,

DEAR SIR: Your recent fight for the American flag to be flown over all flags is to be commended.

In this country, where the state and church are separate, the flag of the state should always be at the top.

If the Catholics insist on flying a flag during their service, why not the following argument: Have a flag adopted by the Navy to be called a church flag, if there is none, and then when church is being held aboard ship have the flags flown, with the Stars and Stripes at the top; below that the church flag and below that the Catholic flag. That would indicate to anybody that it was an American ship holding church and that the services were Catholic. If there is a Protestant flag let that be put in the place of the Catholic flag when the service changes; and a Hebrew flag, if there be one, to be used in the same way if they hold Hebrew services aboard ship.

Hoping that you are successful in carrying this point some day, I am

DEAR SIR: I just read in this morning's paper your brilliant speech of yesterday in the Senate, and I couldn't help writing to you and complimenting that masterpiece of oratory. It is a pleasure to know that at least one Senator has nerve enough to get up and speak what he thinks, one who can not be scared into saying one thing and wishing he could say another.

Now, Senator, is it true that that church is seeking to control the United States? * * * I know you are fighting an up-hill battle and standing almost alone. We admire a man who will battle to the last ditch for his convictions. Thanking you again, I remain,

Yours truly,

THOMAS J. VANDERVEN,

Senator J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Smoke them out. Why should it be necessary to raise the flag question at all? What other church or organization prefers to force recognition by any such tactics? You seem to be equal to the whole Rome-controlled Senate. You and the people more than matched them in the November election, and so far I hear of no retreats and believe there will not be any. They are, of course, chafing with that overwhelming majority piled up on them, or against them. The Pope can issue his own currency and print his own stamps in Rome, but he can't put it over us without a fight. We lost one Tom who defied them, but, thanks, we have another and we are with him. I congratulate you.

DEAR SIR: I read with much interest recently your remarks in the Senate in which you objected to the flying of the church emblem above the United States flag during services at sea. You are reported to have attacked the Roman Catholic Church. I can understand the flying of a plain white flag representing God or religion in general over the American flag, but to fly the emblem of any particular church in that position is to place church above state.

May I express my admiration of your fighting qualities?

Respectfully,

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We, the undersigned members of Kessinger Post, No. 713, American Legion, and ex-service men of past wars in which the United States has taken part * * * commend you for your stand in regard to the floating of other emblems over the Stars and Stripes as mentioned in your address before the Senate.

With all respect to and without prejudice toward any form of religion, and realizing that God is all supreme and should be placed above all else, let us not forget that His kingdom is spiritual while any country of the earth is earthly, and wherein the placing of an emblem, not of the Roman cross but of Christ, above the flag would be proper provided all works of the Army, Navy, and the entire United States were spiritual. However, since the United States is earthly then our flag, the Stars and Stripes, should ever wave above all else as the beloved emblem of our country.

We who have fought and those who have died that our country may stand supreme, have given of our lives the best we had that our flag may not ever suffer defeat; those of us making up the populace of the country who though not having served carry in our hearts that loyalty born in us for our country join hands with them.

Our country and its flag are the greatest of all earthly things, and so let us not desecrate our beloved flag or country by placing over it any emblem of any country, creed, religion, or faction; let us keep her clean, fearless, and true—the greatest of all countries and the most beloved flag of the universe.

We urge that your stand may be upheld and a bill passed that will forever keep the American flag floating above all emblems on all our ships, forts, buildings, and flagpoles of every description in use in this country. * * *

Yours sincerely,

You have done a wonderful work. A Christian work for the good of this great country.

DEAR SENATOR: Just read in this morning Huntington, W. Let me congratulate you on your noble and patriotic stand. May you be kept in good health to keep up the good fight for our own United States. Nothing should be above the Stars and Stripes, except the blue canopy of heaven. I trust that you will be able to arouse the American people to the dangers that threaten us from Rome.

DEAR MR. HEFLIN: I want to congratulate you for the fight you put up to keep the Roman Catholic flag from flying above our own beloved American flag. There are millions of red-blooded Americans that will back you to the limit. Keep up the fight and may God help you to keep our country free. How did the Senators from Iowa vote on your amendment?

One person said this morning that if Al Smith had been elected President he would have tried to lower the immigration bars and then he would want a person who had been in this country only six months to have the vote. I think a foreigner should live in the United States at least 15 years before he can become a citizen. Our own boys have to be 21.

I have been a member of the county Republican central committee for the past eight years, and while the Catholics howl about the Anti-Saloon League and Ku-Klux Klan, etc., I know that the Knights of Columbus are organized from township precinct up, and we need men like yourself with the courage to stand for what is right, and keep them from putting their schemes over at Washington.

Congratulating and thanking you for your gallant fight for our country, I remain

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Having followed with great interest your fight in the Senate against the using of the religious flag above the Stars and Stripes on our battleships, as it is reported in the press, I wish to offer at this time my sincere approval of your position in the matter and congratulate you and thank you for the courage and faithfulness you have shown.

* * * * * * *

I am sure that all real Democrats join with you in spirit in demanding that Raskob's alien influences must be divorced from the Democratic Party before we can expect the people of this Nation to ever support us again.

Again thanking you for your good work, and wishing you success in your war against alienism, and health and prosperity for years and years, I am,

Sincerely yours,

C. F. HALL,
Post-Office Box 1024.

BUFFALO, N. Y., February 7, 1929.

Hon. Senator J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Senator from Alabama.

DEAR SIR: I have followed your work and speeches while you have been a Senator at Washington, and have come to the conclusion that you are one of the greatest Senators that has ever been in the Senate, and Alabama ought to be proud of you. And I guess they are because they have put you into office until 1931; and it gives me pleasure to write to you.

I am interested in the Senate and I am very much interested in the Government of these United States. This is the home of Americans, and I pray to God it will aways be so.

I am 16 years old, Mr. HEFLIN, and am a loyal supporter of you. * * * I hope you continue to have success and happiness for the rest of your life.

An American, and a believer in American rights.

I remain,

FREDERICK G. ROOK,
125 Chenango Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., February 6, 1929.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to congratulate you on the introduction of the amendment to the cruiser bill which you offered on the floor of the Senate yesterday.

Thank God, we have some one in Washington that will stand by our flag and will fight for our American principles. Keep up the fight and you will find many thousands of real Americans backing you to the very last.

Cordially yours,

E. B. CLEMSON,
1227 North Allison Street.

FOUNTAIN INN, S. C., February 7, 1929.

Senator J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.:

DEAR MR. HEFLIN: As I took up the morning's paper I was attracted by your stand on the American flag. It is not every man who will stand up for his convictions. We have some who will stand for our American rights, and I feel that you are one of them. * * * Keep up the good fight. There are many who are backing you and will continue to back you. In my humble way I will do what I can in backing a man who has such ideals as yours.

Truly yours,

R. FURMAN CHILDRESS.

CORYDON, IND., February 9, 1929.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR TOM: As an ex-service man, as a veteran of the World War, as a disabled soldier of the World War, I salute you. I have just read an article in the Birmingham (Ala.) Post that stirs me up.

If there is any man in this Nation who has a perfect right to express himself, then it is a veteran of the World War. You carry the great fight that you have alone started on the floor. I firmly believe HUGO BLACK and many others are with you to a fighting finish.

* * * * * * *

With kindest personal regards, I am sincerely yours,

CHARLIE C. CROWE,
Kintner Building.

P. S.—TOM, don't slack up. Just let us boys back you up. Keep up the good fight.

BOSTON, MASS., February 7, 1929.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Am glad to see you on the "job" at Washington. There is no doubt but that some of those Senators who voted against your flag amendment will receive the same dose that BRUCE, of Maryland, got last fall. * * *

Millions of Americans are with you in this battle for Americanism and will go the limit with you.

With regards to you and family, I am sincerely yours,

EDWIN L. MARSHALL.

ST. PAUL, IND., February 11, 1929.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your amendment relative to a certain class carrying a chaplain's flag above "Old Glory." Those Senators who turned you down knew they were wrong. * * * They are afraid of the Roman boycott and don't realize that Americans are waking up and are going to demand, as George Washington said, "that only Americans be put on guard." If good old Alabama will only keep "Fighting Tom" in the Senate it won't be many years until all Senators will follow your American policy or some of them will be forgotten and real Americans will fill their seats. May God speed the day.

* * * * * * *

With best wishes,

BURLEY EVANS.

CRAFTON, PA., February 7, 1929.

Hon. THOMAS HEFLIN,

United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Let the newspapers and young TYDINGS say what they please, there are thousands of people in these United States of America who will applaud your sentiment that no flag should ever float above the Stars and Stripes. I have been much among patriotic societies in the last 25 years, and I know whereof I speak. What occasion is there for any kind of an emblem over a prayer meeting, except to flaunt a certain type of religion in the faces of other people. I was raised entirely among Protestants, but I am entirely willing that any man may practice this, that, or any other creed as he pleases. The Catholics are the only ones who wear their creed on their hat band, so as to be seen of men. After the hard slap they got last November one would think they would be a little more modest. But from the Catholic press I see that instead of reading the handwriting on the wall they attribute their defeat to "bigotry." Well, those of us who read history now and then may prefer to be bigoted rather than blind. Isn't Papa fighting just now to save a little of his prestige in Italy? Haven't the priests and nuns been scattered like sheep in Mexico? Isn't Spain seething with revolution? Wasn't England obliged to bar Roman Catholics from the succession? Have we forgotten Tetzel and Torquemada, Bruno and Galileo, the thumb-screw and the inquisition, the Huguenots and the Albigenses? TYDINGS talks of placing "God above our country." Our Constitution recognizes God, and the Stars and Stripes are its appropriate emblem. The Virgin Mary is not God and the flag they run up should be red and black, not white. This would be more truly emblematic of Pope, priest, religion, and more in accord with history. Let the Presbyterians, Methodists, or Baptist adopt some distinguishing emblem and float it above our own flag and every Catholic editor, priest, and bishop in the country would yell their lungs out.

More power to you and the nine who voted with you. You have the same stuff in you as the seven bishops who risked their lives rather than surrender their rights.

Very truly yours,

M. H. STEVENSON,
40 Maplewood Avenue.

HEFLIN TAKES WORST LASHING OF LONG CAREER—BITTERLY FLAYED AS "FOOL," FINDS SELF SHOUTED DOWN AND OPPOSED, 68 TO 9

By Ray Tucker, Scripps-Howard staff writer

WASHINGTON, February 6.—Senator HEFLIN was smarting to-day under the worst tongue lashing and legislative licking he has suffered in all his 22 years in House and Senate.

During the stormy war years he was knocked over a House bench by raw-boned ex-Representative Pat Norton, of Minnesota. He was formally castigated in a committee report for insinuations that certain Senators were attending a gambling house where German bribe money was being slipped into their palms.

But not until young Senator TYDINGS, of Maryland, arose to defend Senator BRUCE, of the same State, against the Alabama Member and denounce his activities as designed to foment religious prejudices had HEFLIN ever heard himself called a "damn fool." Both HEFLIN and the Senate gasped at the Marylander's audacity, but there was no word of protest against the language as unparliamentary.

REPLY DROWNED OUT

When HEFLIN arose to reply to TYDINGS cries of "vote" drowned him out, and the ballot was taken so hurriedly as to silence him. Previously there had been an insistent demand that a roll call be taken on HEFLIN'S proposal, apparently in order to dispose of it and him once and for all. The Heflin proposition consisted of an amendment barring any flag or emblem from the same staff with the Stars and Stripes. HEFLIN has often characterized the emblem flown with the flag on naval vessels as "a Roman cardinal's colors."

With obvious anger in their voices 68 Senators—Republicans, Democrats, and Progressives—voted against HEFLIN. Only nine supported him. They were BLACK of Alabama, BROOKHART of Iowa, HALE of Maine, HARRIS of Georgia, MAYFIELD and SHEPPARD of Texas, SWANSON of Virginia, THOMAS of Oklahoma, and TRAMMELL of Florida.

REED of Pennsylvania interrupted TYDINGS to suggest that the people of every State agreed with those of Maryland in condemning the spirit alleged to be behind HEFLIN'S amendment. BORAH of Idaho was another who demanded the opportunity to vote directly on the Heflin proposal.

BITTERLY FLAYED

But it was TYDINGS, a comparative newcomer, who administered the rebuke before crowded galleries.

"I am tired," he said, "of the so-called Christian element that would crucify their fellow men. It is the product of an ignorant mind, of a brain that has been hidden from the sunlight during all the years when mankind has been struggling upward. It is the same thing that was brought here a year ago by a Member of this body. It is the klansman's klan against God's klan.

"I recognize that under the rules and the Constitution every man has a right to make a damn fool of himself. For my part I hope we will always place our God before our country, and if that be unpatriotic let them make the most of it."

HEFLIN gripped the sides of his chair with both hands, but made no protest.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now I ask that the clerk may read in my time an article, which is not very long, from the New Leader entitled "The American Appeal." It is headed "Mussolini's American Intrigues—Fascist Terrorization Extends Its Sway to Citizens of the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

Mr. HEFLIN. I trust that all Senators will give close attention to the reading of this article in order that they may learn what foreign influences are at work in the United States that perhaps they did not know about.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the New Leader (the American Appeal), Saturday, February 16, 1929]

MUSSOLINI'S AMERICAN INTRIGUES—FASCIST TERRORIZATION EXTENDS ITS SWAY TO CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES

Italian Fascism extends to the United States and American citizens of Italian birth are regarded as the subjects of Mussolini. Fascist bands operate on American soil and terrorize Italians and Italian-Americans who fail to swear allegiance to Mussolini. Fascist dictatorship is taught and attempts to enforce it are made through the boycott, intimidation, and the use of physical force. Italian business houses, Italian banks, and Italian professional men are compelled to support Fascism or face ruin. The official organizer of Italian Fascism has traveled freely in the United States, instructing his Fascist bands in the technique of dictatorship.

Why this strange toleration of Fascism by Government officials? If Moscow were to openly send an organizer of the Communist International to this country he would not be admitted. Piero Parini, secretary-general of Mussolini's Fascist Organizations in Foreign Lands, has been in the United States for several weeks. A protest was filed with the Labor Department against his admission, but Parini continued his work without molestation. Having looked after his force squads, he sailed for Italy on February 8. Fascist dictatorship was strengthened by the toleration shown Parini by the officials at Washington.

While Parini was at work in this country his bands in New York City were doing an important job. There is one anti-Fascist daily in the world, Il Nuovo Mondo, published in this city. Mussolini has ordered its destruction. It has been raided by Fascist bands a number of times. On February 5 it was again raided, its machines damaged, and the plant crippled. Since its establishment several years ago this paper which has refused to bow to the brute who rules Italy has been the victim of raids, intimidation, boycott, and terror. Did Parini order this latest raid on Il Nuovo Mondo four days before he returned to his master? Who knows?

LINCOLN VERSUS MUSSOLINI

We have just been celebrating the birthday of Abraham Lincoln. Compare the Emancipator with Mussolini. * * * Compare Lincoln with Mussolini, organizer of massacres, director of the murder of Matteotti, assassin of Italian liberty, the paranoiac who sneers at democracy, who has destroyed popular elections, and who has transformed Italy into a slave state. One man the liberator and the other an enslaver. While we pay our tribute of affection to Lincoln, Mussolini's force squads do the work of Parini in the heart of New York City.

Nor is this all. Italian Fascism openly demands the allegiance of Italian-Americans to the dictator of Italy. Italians in this country, whether American citizens or not, are regarded as colonies of the Fascist Government. They must swear allegiance to Mussolini and to Fascism. An Italian in the United States may be enrolled as a Republican, a Democrat, or a Socialist, but this does not have any significance for Mussolini. The Italian-American is enrolled as a subject of the Fascist Government. Terror dogs his heels if he does not agree.

Here is an example of this amazing insolence. Mr. Santo Modica is secretary of the Italian hospital at 617 East Eighty-third Street, New York City. He is an American citizen and enrolled as a member of the Republican Party. He is the head of the New York section of the Sons of Italy and as such he refused to send a telegram of allegiance to Mussolini. For that act of "disloyalty" to the Italian dictators Fascists have threatened him with injury and have tried to drive him out of office.

FASCISTS THREATEN VIOLENCE

Il Grido della Stirpe is a Fascist organ published in this city. It supports the whole creed of Fascist dictatorship. It has waged war against Modica and its columns have been devoted to inciting violence against him. "Fascism has been too lenient and generous," declared this organ with reference to Modica. "We hoped that things would change without resorting to extreme measures."

Evidently the force squads of Mussolini regard themselves as an extension of the police department of Rome. Modica and other Italian-American citizens must obey this force agency of Mussolini or be prepared to accept "extreme measures." In all our history we have never had such brazen insolence. The next step of the force bands will be to insist that Italian-American citizens pay dues to the Fascists to show their allegiance to Mussolini.

No claim has been made that Modica is not an efficient official. His sole offense is "disloyalty" to the Italian dictator. All groups of Italians in this country, whether they have become citizens or not, are called "colonies." The Italian may be an American voter, he may be a good citizen and comply with every requirement of American citizenship and yet he lives in fear of his life if he does not agree with the castor-oil bandit who rules Italy. If this is to continue the State Department at Washington should at least make this extension of Fascist power to this country legal by treaty with Mussolini. Having done that the next thing in order is to prohibit celebration of Lincoln's birthday and make the castor-oil bandit our ideal of democracy.

LABOR OPPOSES FASCISM

Labor organizations in this country without any exception whatever are recorded against extension of this police, spy, and terror activities of Italian Fascism. The American Federation of Labor news service of February 9 points out that the "property of any Italian living abroad is seized in the event that he opposes the Fascist in his adopted country." Relatives of Italian-Americans who live in Italy are also victims of the terror if Fascism is opposed here. Such relatives in Italy are practically hostages who may be struck down or be imprisoned because of any "disloyalty" here.

The American Federation of Labor news service goes on to say:

"The Fascists use honeyed words in this country to conceal their philosophy. They assure Americans that their party is no different than the Democratic or Republican Party, when, in fact, the Fascist control Italy. They have seized the Italian Government, abolished free press, speech, and popular assemblage, made Parliament a puppet, and supplanted trade unions by Fascist labor organizations controlled by the state. No Italian can be a candidate for Parliament without the approval of the Fascist grand council."

Labor, the weekly publication of the railroad labor organizations, carries a story of the astonishing indifference of the Federal Government to the activities of Parini in the United States, and an Italian trade unionist, makes the following observations in its columns:

"Our Government must know what Mussolini's agents are doing in this country. The dictator takes the position that the Italian who becomes an American citizen still owes allegiance to Italy, or rather to Mussolini himself. He even insists that American-born children of Italian parents are Italians and not Americans.

"Fascist organizations in this country have only one object—to spread a propaganda which is hostile to our scheme of government.

"Secretary of State Kellogg would get terribly excited if the chief propaganda agent of Bolshevism were to attempt to get in, but he will not raise a finger to bar Parini, whose work seriously menaces the peace and happiness of Italians who are citizens of this country and love its institutions."

It is time that Congress made a thorough investigation of the activities of the Fascist bands in the United States. They have become a scandal and a disgrace. If Italian-Americans are to be terrorized for support of the democracy of Lincoln against the dictatorship of Mussolini it is time that we should have some official confirmation of this policy. We are inclined to think that an investigation will show that the trail of Fascist activities leads directly to the door of the Italian Ambassador. It is certain that no representative to a foreign government will be appointed by Mussolini who is not in full accord with the despotic creed of Fascism.

Fascism is reversion back to the sad days of absolutism. It prostitutes the whole intellectual life of a people to the will of murderous fanatics. It is a crime in Italy for the human mind to function. Italian journalism has become a brothel. Administration of justice simply legalizes Fascist lynching. Political parties have been destroyed by force. The club and castor-oil bottle have become the symbols of sovereignty. Labor organizations and cooperatives have been conscripted to the service of fanatics. Italian Fascism has become a monstrous Caliban that must be quarantined as we quarantine healthy communities against leprosy.

Congress owes a duty to the American people to investigate this hateful and unspeakable thing or admit that Italian-American citizens have no rights that are higher than the will of the bandit who rules Italy.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, to follow the article which has just been read, I ask to have read a short editorial from the Washington Post of Friday, February 15, 1929, entitled "Italy's Novel Experiment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ITALY'S NOVEL EXPERIMENT

Interest in the pact between the Italian Government and the Vatican, which at first centered on the fact that the 60-year-old controversy had ended in establishment of an independent state for headquarters of the Roman Catholic Church, has now swung to the possible moral effect of the agreement on the Italian people.

* * * * * * *

Strict censorship of motion pictures will be enforced; literature which is looked upon with disfavor from the Vatican will be suppressed, and the newspapers will have to be even more circumspect in the publication of sensational stories than they have been under Mussolini's censorship.

Dispatches indicate that Protestant, Greek Orthodox, and Jewish sects will be tolerated in Italy, but will no longer be able to carry on religious propaganda. This appears to be a renunciation of the principle of religious freedom which has gained a strong foothold throughout the civilized world. All nations will be interested in the experiment and its results. It remains to be seen whether a people can be forced into righteousness through legislation and curtailment of religious liberties under a dictatorial form of government.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have had these two important articles read for the purpose of giving some Senators who do not appear to be apprised of the insiduous efforts that are being made by certain dangerous influences in America to overthrow this Government. I have had those two articles read for the purpose of getting them in the RECORD, so that they may go out into every State in the Union, where the people back home may be informed as to what is being done to the hurt and injury of this great Republic. I do that for the purpose that they may begin to write to their Senators who seem to be either asleep or deaf and dumb on this subject.

I saw some of them a few days ago vote against their flag being first and uppermost on its own staff. I saw them vote deliberately to lower it every time some one wants to fly the Roman cross above it. By a vote of 68 to 10 in the greatest deliberative body in the world certain Senators went on record to do that, while Catholic priests in the gallery smiled their hearty approval.

Mr. President, that was a sad day to me, for a great many of these Senators are good men, and I believe, in the main, are good Americans; but it is a fact that we have got a lot of men in public life who are afraid of the political influence of the Catholic machine in the United States, and we have got to meet that question; and the sooner we do it openly and determinedly the better it will be for all who really love our country.

Every Catholic reporter in the press gallery has attacked me most viciously since my speech the other day in behalf of the American flag. I showed here on a former occasion testimony to the effect that Catholic newspaper reporters had been instructed to "go after HEFLIN," and they are still carrying out their Catholic instructions.

They and other Catholic agencies are still carrying on their false and vicious propaganda against me. They have marked me for political slaughter, and they have threatened to murder me. I receive insulting and threatening letters from them now, written by unprincipled persons who are too cowardly to sign their names to them. They have resolved and they have baldly boasted that they are going to pick out a candidate to oppose me for the Senate in Alabama in 1930. I welcome the opportunity to discuss before the people of Alabama the issues that threaten free Government in America. I am willing to go to the mat with whoever they select and fight it out with him.

Mr. President, I feel that it is the duty of every Senator to tell the Senate and the country of anything and everything that concerns the welfare of this country. I repeat what I said here the other day: I do not object to the Catholic having the religion of his choice. But I do object to the secret and insidious activities of the Roman Catholic political machine. That political machine is the vehicle used by Roman Catholic leaders to carry forward into governmental affairs the Roman Catholic purpose to bring this Government under Catholic control. That that church has its program already laid out to capture America, no discerning man doubts, and that their plan is to control at an early day the United States, no informed citizen can doubt for a moment.

But you have a situation in the United States, and right here at this Capitol, that is alarming and dangerous. When a measure comes up affecting the Catholic political program Senators and Members of the House are besieged. And somehow or other they always have somebody in this body to speak for them.

A few days ago, when I raised the question here of permitting the United States flag to remain on its own hoist, majestically alone, proudly flying at the top of the staff, when I said there was no excuse for lowering it to fly anybody's pennant or banner above it, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] rose in this body and asked me what flag is now permitted to fly above it? "Oh," I said, "I am not discussing any particular flag. I do not want any flag or banner to fly above it." The Senator said, "Is it not a fact that the Catholic flag is the only one that flies above it?" I said, "That is the only one that I have seen fly above it." I exhibited a picture here of the battleship Florida that showed that to be the case, and, following that disclosure, you voted to continue that practice.

The issue is plain and you can not dodge it, Senators. I respect you all and am fond of many of you, personally, but this American issue must be met. We can not afford to be asleep any longer. The American people must be aroused to a full sense of the danger that threatens.

It is now admitted that the cross that flies above our flag is the cross of St. George, and he was a Roman Catholic. It is admitted even by some of these Catholic pen pushers in the press gallery that it is a Latin cross. The churches of the United States have never agreed upon any particular pennant to fly above the United States flag on our battleships during religious services, and yet when Protestants and Jews aboard our ships have service now, under your vote the other day, they have to pull down the American flag and fly the Roman cross.

Senators, the day is not far distant when you are not going to be afraid to look a Roman Catholic in the face and tell him that you are against his plan and purpose to Catholicize America and place this Government under Catholic rule.

I told you a year ago what was going to happen in Italy. Perhaps some of you do not remember it. I will remind you of what I said then. I told you that Mussolini was a crook. I told you that he was an unscrupulous scoundrel, and that he was playing into the Roman Catholic Pope's hands, and that he would deliver that Government to him before he was through; and now he has done it. I told you that the Rome newspaper reports to the effect that Mussolini and the Pope were not on good terms was all a hoax. I told you that that was the impression they wanted to make until the day of delivery should come; and now, since Italy has been beaten to her knees and all her independent, fighting, patriotic forces are prone upon the ground and her free speech and free press and right of public assembly have been destroyed, and Masons have been butchered like hogs in the market place, and the grand master of that order put in prison, Mussolini, like a thief in the night, slips over and delivers the Government of Dante and Garibaldi into the control of the Roman Catholic Pope, who is now a king, a Roman Catholic king, extending his canon law all over the Government of Italy; and now the Roman press over there tells us that Mussolini and the Pope have been good friends ever since Mussolini took control of Italy.

It is plain and simple now; everybody can understand it. Now, what have we right here in the United States? We have this dangerous, tyrannical dictator of the Italian Government, with his agents in the United States operating and terrorizing the people in various places, and particularly in Chicago; his Fascist bands are holding up the people there; and I bid Godspeed to the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. DENEEN], who is leading the fight against the bandits and the outlaws in Chicago.

Senators, did you know that the Fascist organization in the United States had their national convention a few months ago at Philadelphia and wired their compliments and congratulations to Mussolini and expressed to him their allegiance—citizens of the United States? Did you get the full meaning of that article read from the desk about an Italian-American—a Republican, too, if you please—who refused to send a telegram of allegiance to Mussolini, and Mussolini had ordered his newspaper plant in New York destroyed; that Fascists, Mussolini's followers in the United States, had gone there and attacked him in person two or three times; they had injured his printing press, and they have sworn that he shall be driven out of business?

Senators, wake up—you Senators who are sitting around here sound asleep on this question. You may not be willing to consider it here; but, thank God, you are soon going into an open forum where you will have to consider it. The people out yonder are coming to know about these dangerous, un-American activities and they are going to demand that you wake up.

I have received probably 2,000 letters—maybe 3,000—from men and women all over this country since this flag issue was up in the Senate a few days ago.

I have eliminated the references to Senators in letters from their States; but you may get an idea how the people back home feel about this from the parts of the letters that I have printed this morning, just a few out of the thousands of letters I have received from 26 or 27 States of this Union. I will print some of the letters from the other States later. I am not attacking the individual Catholic. Let the Catholic have his religion. God knows I would not deprive him of it. I want him to be permitted to approach the throne of grace as he pleases to do it. If it suits him to confess to a priest, let him do it; but, Mr. President, I want to tell you that the history of Roman Catholic rule all over this world is the history of intolerance, persecution, bloodshed, and murder.

Look what happened the other day in Mexico! Obregon—one of the strongest men Mexico has ever produced; upstanding, brave, fearless—he and his friend Calles gave stability to that country, brought it out of darkness and chaos and put it upon its feet, and delivered Mexican peons out of the bondage of Roman Catholic slavery. Four hundred years of Catholic rule had benighted and enslaved them. They were groping ignorantly and helplessly in the dark gloom of Catholic rule, and Calles and Obregon stretched forth the healing rod and gave that land deliverance. Still the country is cursed with Catholic intrigue and murder. The Catholic Church leaders, the priests, and nuns are seeking to overthrow the present constitutional Government in Mexico; and how are they going about it? When Obregon was elected President recently they sent a cowardly cur, a Mexican Roman Catholic, to the dining room where Obregon was taking his meal, and they had the Catholic assassin feign as an artist who was pleading for an opportunity to exhibit pictures to President Obregon; and Obregon, the brave, big-hearted man that he was, wanting to encourage the boy in his work as an artist, said, "Yes; I will be glad to look at his pictures and help him along."

He comes around with his pictures and with that deadly weapon hid away, draws it, and shoots Obregon to death at the table where he was eating his meal. While he was shooting him Catholic band players were playing the band so loud that some of the people in the dining room never heard the shots. When that cowardly and miserable wretch, scum of the earth and vagabond, was cornered by Mexican officers of the law, he confessed that a Catholic nun and a Catholic priest inspired that dastardly deed; and finally, when they got him ready to march him out and shoot him, as they should have shot him, against the wall, the Catholics paraded him in the newspaper columns as a martyr, and the Catholic-controlled press of Mexico City deliberately tried to use the incident as propaganda to stir up opposition to the Mexican Government. Why, they described him as marching forth calmly, when the fact is that he was scared to death when he heard the noise of the mob outside. They had him saying to the barber, "Come, go over my face again; it is still a little rough," just like he was some great spirit; that is what they would have us think he was. He did not care. They would have us believe he was calm and serene—drunk on the whisky they had given him, perhaps! Why, even that part of the report said he drank half a pint of cognac brandy. He could not tell whether there were any whiskers left on his face or not after that. But, Mr. President, after he was shot, sent down to death for murdering the President of the Mexican Republic, the Catholic press played up a Roman Catholic priest going in to the dead assassin with his handkerchief and dipping it into his blood to preserve it as a sacred relic, a memento of a martyred Catholic! Think of it! It is all shocking and sickening.

Senators, this Nation is in for trouble with that same unscrupulous and ambitious power; and the United States, this young giant of the western world, is the world's hope to preserve religious liberty. America, in her determination to preserve civil and religious liberty, fears no foreign pope or potentate. America is not afraid of the Catholic assassin, although three of them have killed three American Presidents.

If ever such a thing occurs again in our country there must be a house cleaning in the high places of those who bring it about.

Just recently, when President-elect Hoover was visiting in this God-loving and God-fearing country, down in the sunny land of Florida, amongst as fine people as live, represented by two as fine Senators as ever sat in this body, Senator FLETCHER and Senator TRAMMELL, two Italian Catholics saw him, and one of them said, "I don't like the looks of that guy; let's throw a bomb under him," and talked about assassinating a President as they would talk about killing a housefly. Is it not time that we were taking stock of the un-American groups in our country? In the name of Washington and Jefferson and Lincoln and Lee, what are we coming to in the United States? Let us say to the Catholic, "You will not be disturbed in your religious worship. Nobody has any desire to disturb you in that regard. But we are not going to permit you to teach to Catholic children in the United States the union of church and state and we are not going to permit you to strike down religious freedom and set up the Catholic state in the United States."

The Roman Catholic political machine can not deceive true Americans by displaying a religious banner and harping on religious intolerance, while underneath its cloak it has a deadly dirk for religious freedom for all American denominations that do not accept a Roman Catholic Italian Pope as God's exclusive representative on earth. Go read the History of Civilization, by Buckle, and you will find he tells that when Spain reached the climax and crowning glory of her civilization she was pulled down and destroyed by Roman Catholic priests. Go read Gibbons' Decline and Fall of Rome and you will find that the fall of Rome was helped and hastened by the doings and the teachings of Roman Catholic priests. Yet some of you seem to be sound asleep. When this question was broached the other day two or three veteran Senators rose up and trembling said they would have to vote against the flag because somebody had injected the Catholic religious issue.

Senators, how long, how long will it take us who are here to defend and safeguard the rights and interests of this Republic to wake up to the dangers that threaten it? Roger Williams, the heroic leader of religious freedom in the early days in the United States, a Baptist, was set aside the other day to give place to some Catholic in Baltimore, and the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. GERRY, permitted it to be done. He did not defend him.

I want to know if you are going to follow the voice of the dead or the voice of the living. The main ones of those who championed that movement the other day to continue to fly the Roman cross—the Pope's cross—above the American flag were two Senators who had been defeated. They are going out. And you who sit here supposed to represent your people, misrepresented them on that day, as my letters indicate. It would open your eyes to read some of my letters, and some of them are so strong regarding some of you that I will not publish them, but the people are talking about what they are going to do regarding you when they get you before the electorate again.

Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland injected the religious question when my flag amendment was before the Senate. Many Senators have said to me since, "You did not inject the religious question; Senator BRUCE did it." I said, "Of course he did." But, as I said the other day, that was the signal. Word had already been passed around. These priests had not been sitting around here so thick for nothing, poking out their necks and peeking about in this body. My amendment had been printed for a week; they knew it was going to be offered at the proper time at the end of the bill. When that time came I was utterly surprised; I have never been so astounded in my life that an American Senate would stand up and order, by their vote, that our flag be pulled down to fly above it the Roman cross—the Catholic king's cross.

After I finished my speech here you went on record in a way that you will wish to God you never had gone; I am telling you now, and you see if I am not right; the people will not permit that kind of subserviency to the Roman Catholic political power in the United States; and that is what it is. It is not religious power; it is political power. It is a double-headed thing. One part calls itself religion and the other is a bold and brazen political serpent; and some of you are as afraid of it as you are of death.

I have had Senators talk to me, and Members, too, at times—and this has been going on some time—about having Catholics in their districts at home; and that they would punish a fellow and vote against him if he did or did not do certain things. That is all true; they will. But I want the Americans who read my speech and who get what I am saying here to-day to learn—I pray to God they may—and whenever the Catholics threaten a Protestant Senator and tell him they will beat him if he does not do the bidding of the Roman Catholics, I want them to rise up and say, "We American Protestants and Jews, American Italians and other Americans, will punish you for raising that question and trying to control this country." That is what is going to happen, and you are going to hear from it. My letters indicate that very strongly every day.

I ask that the clerk read the letter which I send to the desk. I have stricken the name and the address of the person writing it from the letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHIPPS in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 11, 1929.

Senator THOMAS HEFLIN,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am now in business and no longer in newspaper work, so that I can speak frankly, * * * and I wish to say that I am sure you express in the Senate what a great many Protestants think. There are more men behind you than you dream of * * * and yours is the voice thousands—millions—welcome.

There is one point I wish to present. Do you realize that the tremendous demonstrations at the execution of Obregon's murderer in Mexico was fostered by the Catholics? Did you read the Associated Press account of where the priest dipped his handkerchief in the murderer's blood? This is propaganda pure and simple, and it follows naturally that the Catholics promoted and (or) incited the attempt on President Gil's life in the bombing of his train.

Isn't it strange, too, that the treaty giving the Pope temporal power and including the church "canons" in the civil law of Italy should come after our own presidential campaign? No! This merely is part of the Catholic set-up. You can see this and I can see this. You are in touch, doubtless, with influential Protestants. Please, for the cause you so admirably represent and which affects millions of true Protestants in this country, do something to counteract this Roman propaganda. Millions are looking to you to speak their minds. Don't fail in this immediate emergency.

Yours sincerely,

——— ———.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I omitted publishing the name of that splendid former newspaper man because of what I feared would happen to him. He is a northern man.
